And L. Manlius were Consuls. In the time of M. Junius and A. Manlius Consuls of Rome, the Senat. entituled and honoured him with the name of King, and eleven years his reign continued. The name of these Macedonians was very obscure and base, untill the daies of Philip the son of Amynas. From that time and by his means it began to grow and was great: howbeit, contained it was within the compass and precincts of Europe, comprehending all Greece, and part of Thrace and Illyricum. Afterwards it spread into Asia, and in thirteen years space, during the reign of Alexander, it subdud and brought under subjection, first all those parts whereunto the empire of the Persians extended, which was an infinit dominion in circuit: afterwards it reached to Arabia and India, even to the end of the earth, bounding and confining all about upon the red sea. At that time was the monarchy and name of the Macedonians the greatest in the whole world, but upon the death of Alexander, distracted it was and divided into many and sundry Kingdoms. And whiles each one endeavoured & strove by force to draw unto him more and more puissance, they dismembred and rent the whole: & so from the highest top & pitch of prosperity, brought it down to a most base and low condition; after it had continued in good estate a hundred and fifty years.

When the bruit of the Romans victory was blazed and blown as far as to Asia, Antenor who with a fleet of barks and pinnaces rid in the harbour of Phana, sailed from thence to Cassandrea, C. Popilius, who was in Delos to guard and wait those ships which were bound for Macedonia, after he heard say that the war in Macedonia was brought to an end, and the enemies vessels removed out of their rode, dismissed also for his part the Athenian ships, intending to go forward in his voiage for Egypt, to accomplish that embassage which he had taken in hand: to the end that he might encounter Antiochus, before he approached the walls of Alexandria. As these Embassadors coasted along the river of Asia, and were arrived at Loryma (a port somewhat more than twenty miles distant from Rhodes, and situate just over against the city) the principal States of Rhodes, met him in the way (for now by this time was the fame of this victory flown so far) requesting him to set sail thither and there to land: for that it concerned their city much in fame and reputation, yea, and was expedient for their good and safety, that they should be made acquainted with all that either had been done or was now in hand at Rhodes, and so to make report thereof at Rome upon their own knowledge, and not as things were voiced by the common bruit. They refused a long time, but in the end they were so importuned, that content they were to sail a little farther, and spend some small time for to gratify and benefit a city associat unto them. When they were come to Rhodes, the same principal citizens aforesaid urged them instantly with much prayer and entreaty to come into their general assembly of the people. The arrival of those Embassadors rather augmented than empaired the fear of the city. For Popilius made rehearsal there in open audience, of all which had been done or spoken (sounding any way to hostility) either in particular or in general by them, during the late war: And being as he was, a grim fir, tough and fierce by nature, he aggravated all that he spake, with his four visage and sharp language, like an accuser at the bar: in so much as they might well conjecture and guesse, how the whole body of the Senate stood affected unto them, by the bitterness of one only Senator, who otherwise for himself had no occasion of particular ill will and malice against the city. But the speech of Decimius was more temperate, who said, that the blame of those imputations for the most part which were objected by Popilius, was not to be laid upon the people, but upon a few persons, who had solicited and stirred the multitude: for those having their tongue at hire, and using to speak for gain, had made decrees full of flattery to please the King, and sent such embassages, as the Rhodians at all times were no less ashamed than repented of. All which practises of theirs no doubt would fall upon their heads who were faulty, in case the people had the government and rule in their own hands. Audience he had with great assent and applause: not more for elevating the fault and trespass of the common people, than for laying the weight upon those that were the authors culpable. And therefore when the chief men among them made answer to the Romans, their words, who went about to excuse and save in some sort as well as they could the articles objected by Popilius, were not so well taken, as their speech who accorded to Decimius, in delivering the guilty persons and offenders to be punished according to their demerits. Whereupon there passed presently a decree, That all those who might be convicted of any deed done or word spoken in favour of Persus against the Romans, should be condemned and have sentence to lose their heads. Some of these persons were departed out of the city upon the coming of the Romans, others laid violent hands upon themselves. These Embassadors or delegats having sojournd no longer than five daies at Rhodes, departed and made sail for Alexandria. And notwithstanding their absence, the execution of judicial proceeding was no less hotly followed at Rhodes, according to the decree made in their presence. For the moderation and gentle carriage of Decimius was the very cause that they persisted resolute, and gave not over untill they had gone through with it, and dispatched all.

While these affairs were thus managed, Antiochus after he had assailed in vain to force the walls of Alexandria, was departed from before the city, & having possessed himself of all Egypt besides, and left the elder Ptolemaus at Memphis, (for whose behoof he pretended by his own forces to reconquer the Kingdom, to the end that soon after the conquest obtained, he might let upon him like wife) withdrew his army away into Syria. Ptolemaus for his part was nothing ignorant of his designment and intention, making full account, that whiles he kept his younger brother affrighted with the fear of siege, by the help of his sister he might be received into Alexandria: considering withal, that his brothers friends were not opposed against him, first he sent unto his sister, afterwards to his brother and his friends, and never gave over to write and send, before he had concluded and established a peace with them. The thing that made him so suspect Antiochus was this, for that when he had made over all the rest of * Egypt unto him, he left yet a strong garrison behind at Pelusium: and well he knew, that he held still the frontier Towns as the very keys of Egypt, to the end that he might with an army enter and invade again, whensoever he would. And thus he conceived of it, that this would be the issue of the civil and domestical war between brethren. That the victor wearied with war, should not be able to make head against Antiochus. These things wisely forecast and seen by the elder brother, were received with assent of the younger and those that were assistant about him: and the sister between stood in very good stead, not by her good advice and counsel only, but also by her effectual prayers. And therefore by a general accord of all, a peace was concluded, and the elder Ptolemæus received into Alexandria, without any gain-saying or resistance, as all so much as of the very multitude: notwithstanding that during the war they were much decayed and weakened (not only by the siege, but also after it was raised and the army gone from Alexandria) for want of all things, by reason that no provisions were brought thither from out of Egypt. Now, where as Antiochus should have taken great contentment and rejoiced much for this, in case he had brought his forces into Egypt for to restore Ptolemæus into his own estate (which was the goodly pretence and colourable shew that he made to all the States of Asia and Greece, when he received their embassages, or sent forth his letters into all parts) so it fell out, that he was so highly offended and displeased hereat, that he went in hand and prepared to make war now against them both much more eagerly and with greater malice than before against one alone. Presently he rigged and sent out his navy at sea to Cyprus: himself in person at the beginning of the spring minding to invade Egypt, marched forward with his army as far as into Cæle-Syria. The Embassadors of Ptolemæus encountered him in his journey about * Rhinocolura, and gave him thanks in behalf of their K. and master, for that by his means he had recovered the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom: requesting withal to maintain that benefit and good deed of his, to declare rather by word of mouth what he would have done, than deal by sword in hand and force of arms, and not of a friend and ally to become a mortal enemy. His answer was, that he would neither call back his fleet nor withdraw his army upon any condition, unless he quit unto his use as well the whole Isle of Cyprus, as the City * Pelusium, together with the territory about the mouth of Nilus, called * Pelusiæcum Ostium. And therewith he set him down a day, before which he expected to receive his answer as touching the accomplishment of the said conditions. After the day prefixed for the truce was past, as they sailed in the mouth of Nilus near Pelusium, the States along the deserts of Arabia yielded. Then, being received of them that inhabite about Memphis, and the rest of the Egyptians, partly with favor and good will, and partly for fear and constraint: by small journies he descended toward Alexandria. When he was passed over the river at Leufina (a place about 4 miles distant from Alexandria) the Roman Embassadors met him upon the way. After greetings and salutations at their first coming, he put forth his right hand to Popilius; but he delivered unto him a scroll written, and willed him before he did any thing else to read that script. After he had read the writing through, he answered that he would devise with his friends and consider what was best to be done. But Popilius according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech which he had by nature, made a circle about the King with the rod that he had in his hand, and withal, "Make me an answer (qd. he) I advise you such as I may report to the Senate, before you pass the compass of this circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a commandment, after he had staied and paused a while: I will be content (qd. he) to do whatsoever the Senat shall ordain. Then and not before, Popilius gave the King his hand as to a friend and ally. Afterwards when Antiochus was departed out of Egypt by the day prefixed, the said Embassadors having by their authority established concord also between the two brethren (who as yet were not thoroughly agreed) some of them sailed to Cyprus, and from thence they sent away the fleet of Antiochus, which already had given an overthrow in battail to the Egyptian ships. This was a noble embassy and much renowned among those nations, for that thereby Egypt was undonbredly taken from Antiochus, who was as good as possessed thereof already, and the N inheritance of the Kingdom restored again to the race of Ptolemæus.

Of the two Consuls that year, like as the one was famous in his place by this notable victory, so the other was little or nothing spoken of, by reason he had not matter of any great exploit to be employed in. And first of all when he was assigned a certain day for the legions to meet, he entred into the temple without the lucky approbation of the auspices. And when the Augurs were moved and their advice required therein, they declared, that there was an error committed in the appointment of the said day. In his voyage for France he kept his standing leaguer for the summer time about the mountains Sicimina and Papinnus near the plains called * Maecti. And afterwards he wintered about the same places with the allies of the Latine nation. For the Roman legions, because the day was not rightly appointed for the assembly of the forces at the Rendez-vous, remained behind at Rome. Also the Pretors save only C. Pappus. Carbo, unto whose lot Sardinia was fall, went forth into their Provinces: and him the LL. of the Senate had ordained to attend upon his civill jurisdiction at Rome between citizens and forrainers. Popilius likewise, that embassy which was sent to Antiochus returned to Rome: where he made relation that the controversies between the two Kings were decided, & the army of Antiochus retired out of Egypt into Syria. After this, came the Embass. also of the Kings themselves. Those of Antiochus made report that the King their master

A master esteemed more of the peace approved by the Senat, than of any victory whatsoever; and obeyed the orders set down by the Roman Embassadors, no less than the very messengers coming with commandments directly from the Gods: and finally they testified their own contentment, and wished them great joy of their victory obtained, saying that the King himself would have been with all his power at the achieving thereof, in case he had been enjoined to perform any service. The Embassadors of Prolemus in the name jointly of their King and of Cleopatra, rendered thanks unto them, acknowledging themselves more bound & beholden to the Senat and people of Rome, than to their own parents, yea & more than to the immortal Gods; for by their good means they were first delivered from the most lamentable miseries of a siege, and had recovered their fathers Kingdom, which they were at the point to have lost forever. The Senat returned this answer again, That whereas Antiochus had been ruled by the Embassadors, therein he did well and as it be-
 C feemed him, and in so doing he highly contented and pleased the Senat and people of Rome. Again, if Prolemus and Cleopatra the King and Queen of Egypt, had found any goodness and com-
 D modity by them, the Senat was very glad therefore and rejoiced thereat and would endeavour and work it so, that they might be perswaded that the greatest assurance and safeguard of their realm rested at all times most in the faithful protection of the people of Rome. This said, the Pretor C. Pappus had in charge to see that presents and gifts were sent to these Embassadors according to the ancient custome. Then were letters brought out of Macedony to redouble the joy of the vi-E ctory, importing that Perseus was sure enough in the hands of the Consul.

When those Embassadors were dismissed and gone, much debate and argument there was be-
 C tween the Embassadors of the Pisans and Lunenses. They of Pisa complained that they were dis-
 D seized & driven out of their territory by the Roman coloners; contrarywise those of Luna plain-E ly averred, that the Land in controversy had been set out and assigned for them by the Triumvirs. The Senat hereupon sent five men as commissioners to make inquisition into the limits of the said territory and to determine accordingly, and those were Q. Fabius Buteo, P. Cornelius Blasio, T. Sempronius Musca, L. Navius Balbus, and C. Apuleius Saturninus. There came likewise a solemn em-bassage sent in common from Eumenes, Attalus, and Athenus, all three brethren to notify the joy and contentment which they took for the Romans victory. Moreover, L. Manlius the treasurer was ready at Puteoli to receive and welcome Masgaba the son of K. Masinissa, as he should disembark and set on land: for sent he was of purpose with money to meet him upon the way, to conduct D him also and bring him to Rome at the cities charges. He was no sooner come, but immediately au-
 E dience was given him in the Senat.

This young Prince spake in such sort, as the things which of " themselves were acceptable enough indeed, he graced and made more worthy of acceptance by " his good words. He rehearsed what forces of foot and horse both; how many Elephants, what " quantity of corn for that four years space (during the war) his father had sent over into Maced-
 " ony. But two things there were for which he was dismayed and could not chuse but blush: the " one that the Senat by their Embass. had made request unto him and not commanded rather to " furnish them with necessaries for the war: the other, that they had sent them money to pay for " their corn. For Masinissa was not forgetful, but bare well in mind, that he held his Kingdom as " first conquered for him, afterwards augmented and amplified many waies unto him by the peo" ple of Rome; and for his own part he could content himself with the use and occupation thereof,
 " as a tenant in fee-farm, acknowledging the propriety and possession thereof to be in them, who
 " as Lords of the fee feoffed him therein. Good reason therefore and meet it was that they also " should be bold with their own to take and not to ask, to have and not to crave, much less then " to buy the commodities & fruits issuing out of the lands by them demised given & granted. As " for Masinissa, sufficed he was, and evermore would rest contented with that overplus which the " people of Rome might leave and spare for him. Thus much (sd. he) I had in charge and commis" sion from my fathers own mouth, when I departed and took my leave of him: but afterwards
 " certain horsemen riding post overtook me, to let me understand that Macedony was subdued, and
 " to charge me, that after I had signified our joy in your behalf, I should shew unto the Senat, that " my father took such contentment therein, that he would gladly come to Rome, to offer sacrifice
 " and render thanks to Jupiter, Max in the Capitol: which to do he requested leave of the Senat, " so might stand with their good liking and be no trouble unto them. The Prince received this " answer from the Senat, That his father Masinissa did as becommed a good man and thankful per" son to do in giving such a grace and honor over & above, to benefit of duty required. More" over, that the people of Rome acknowledged how they had received great help at his hands in the " Punic war by his valiant and loyal service, as well as he obtained his Kingdom through the fa" vour of the people of Rome, yea, and afterwards according to equity and justice, had born himself
 " right worthily in all sorts of devotions and duties during the wars of three Kings one after ano" ther. Neither was it any marvel at all, that he rejoiced at the victory in the people of Rome, be" ing a King who had engaged, hazarded, and entangled all his own fortunes and the whole estate " of his Kingdom with the Roman affairs. As for rendering thanks to the Gods for the victory of " the people of Rome, let him do that himself in his own house at home: for it should suffice, that " his son for him performed that duty at Rome. That he and his father both had sufficiently for " their parts testified their joy. As for Masinissa in proper person to leave his realm and depart out
 " of Africa: over and besides that it was in no wise profitable in himself, the Senat deemed it " not expedient for the weal-publick of the people of Rome. Masgaba further more requested, that Hanno the son of Amilcar should be sent hostage in place of another Carthaginian (whose name is not known) but the Senat answered, That they thought it not meet to demand hostages at the pleasure of Masinissa. The treasurer was commanded by order from the Senat, to buy certain presents for to bestow upon this young Prince, namely, as much plate as might wile out of an 100 pound weight of silver: also to accompany him as far as Puteoli: to defray all his charges during his abode within Italy; and to hire two ships for to transport and conduct him & his princely train into Africk. To all his retinue as well bond as free there was allowance made of apparel.
 " that

Not long after, were letters brought as concerning Masinissa the second son of Masinissa: who after that Paulus had vanquished Persus, was sent home by the said Paulus into Africk with his Cavalry: but as he sailed, was driven (sick as he was) upon Brundisium with three ships only, for that the rest of the fleet was dispersed in the Adriatick Sea. Stertinius the treasurer was sent to him at Brundisium, with the like gifts as were bestowed upon his brother at Rome, and a charge to see to his lodging.

By vertue of an act granted out of the Senat, the Libertins [i. the sons of freed men] were enrolled into the four tribes of the City, all save those who had a son above five years old: with express commandment, That when they were to be enrolled at the review next ensuing, their goods also should be valued, and they accordingly entred into the subsidy books: namely, That as many of them as possessed any manor or manors in the countrey, esteemed better worth than 30000 Sesterces, should be enrolled and assessed. This ordinance being thus observed, Claudius denied flatly, that the Censor had authority to take from any particular person, and much less from a whole state and degree of men, the right and liberty of suffrages, without the warrant and ordinance of the people: for say, that he have power to take a man out of his tribe, (which is nothing else but to command him to change his tribe) it followeth not then, that he may dispossess and displace him out of all the 35 tribes, which is as much as to strike him out of the number of citizens, and deprive him quite of his freedom and burgesse: and is not (I say) to limit and set down in what rank he shall be enrolled, but to exclude him full and wholly out of all enrolment. This dispute and debate passed between them: untill at last they grew to this point, that of the four City tribes, they should cast lots openly in the Hall and Cloister of Libertas for one tribe, in which all they should be registred and comprised, who had been villains sometimes and were enfranchised. Now this lot fell to the tribe Exquilina. Then Tib. Gracchus pronounced, That ordained it was to enrol in it all the Libertins. Great honour and reputation with the Senat gained the Censors by this act: Sempronius likewise won much thanks therefore, because he had persisted constantly in that good enterprise so well commended: and Claudius went not without his due thank, for that he was no hindrance to this proceeding. In this review and survey taken by the Censors, more Senators were removed and put out of the council: yea, and more Gentlemen commanded to sell their horses of service, than by other Censors in former time. And all those by both of them joyntly were not only displaced out of their tribes, and made no better than Aerarii (i. to lose their voice) but also to pay all taxes whatsoever to the utmost. And look who was noted and disgraced by the one, had no relief nor hope to recover his credit and place by the other. Now when these Censors demanded, That according to a custome and order, they might be allowed a years space and two months, to look into the reparations of the publick edifices, that they were maintained wind-tight and water-tight: as also to see whether they who had undertaken to finish certain works at a price, had performed their bargain accordingly: C. Terentius a Tribune interposed himself and denied this demand, for anger that he was not chosen and taken into the Senat. The same year C. Cerealis dedicated a chappel in the Albane mount, which he had vowed five years before. Also that year was L. Posthumus Albinus enrolled a Flame of Mars. The Consuls Q. Aelius and M. Junius propounded in the Senat, as touching the government of their Provinces: and the LL. ordained, That Spain should be divided again into two Provinces, which had been united in one during the Macedonian war: also that the same L. Aelius and L. Aneius should defend and keep in obedience as before, Macedonia and Thyrionia, with such time as they by the advice of certain deputed commissioners, had both composed all matters and affairs disordered and troubled by the wars: and also reformed the estate of that realm, by reducing it into a new form. The Provinces assigned unto the Consuls were Pisic and Gallia, and they had the command of two legions of footmen, and four hundred horsemen apiece. The Pretors had their lots for government as followeth: The civil jurisdiction over citizens fell to Q. Cassius, and over strangers to M. Juvenius Tullus: Tib. Claudius Nero was deputy of Sicily, C. Fulvius of the bither Spain, and C. Licinius Nerva of the farther: left of ally, M. Manlius Torquatus was appointed to the government of Sardinia: but into his province he could not go, by occasion that he was detained at home by vertue of an act of the Senat, to make inquisition into certain felonious and capital crimes. After this consultation there was in the Senat touching the prodigies which were reported. The chappel of the Penates (protectors of the City) in Pala was smitten with thunder and lightning: Also in the Town Minerua, two gates and a good part of the wall felt the like harm. At Ardea it had rained earth, and in Alatrinum there appeared in the shie a burning flame: Moreover, M. Valerius a citizen of Rome gave knowledge, that in Calatia within the publick territory of that City, for the space of three dayes and two nightes together, blood gushed out in his chimney hearth where he kept fire: and for this strange sight above all the rest, the Decemvirs were commanded to have recourse unto the books of Sibylla: who

* This hath respect to some other act, which is not extant.

A proclaimed a publick supplication of the people for one day; and sacrificed fifty goats in the common market place of the City. Also in regard of the other prodigies, a supplication was holden another day, and men did their devotions at every altar of the Gods: greater beasts were killed for sacrifices, and the City was solemnly cleansed and purged. This done, as touching the honor of the immortal Gods, the Senat ordained, that forasmuch as the two Kings Perseus & Genius their enemies were overcome, and now at the devotion of the people of Rome, together with Macedony and Illyricum, Q. Cassius and M. Junius the Pretors should give order for as great oblations to be offered unto the Gods at every shrine and altar as had been heretofore (when App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls) for the defeat of King Antiochus. Then they ordained certain delegats, by whose advice L. Paulus and L. Anicius the two Generals, might set all affairs in order, namely, ten into Macedony, and five into Illyricum. For Macedony were nominated A. Posthumius Luscanus and C. Claudius, (who both had been Censors) C. Licinius Cassius, late companion to Paulus in the Consulship, and who at that present had the government of Gaul continued him. To these delegats above-named, men of Consular dignity all by their calling, were adjoined in commission Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, Ser. Cornelius Sylla, L. Junius, C. Anicius Labes, T. Numisius Tarquinienus, and Autus Terentius Varrus. For Illyricum were these named, P. Elius Liguis, one that had been Consul, C. Cicereius and Cn. Babius Tamphilus (this Babius had been Pretor but the former year, and Cicereius many years past) P. Terentius Tuscanus, and P. Marcius. Then the Consuls being advertised by the L. of the Senat, that (forasmuch as one of them must succeed C. Licinius in Gaul, who was nominated one of the delegats) they should part their Provinces between them either by accord and agreement, or by lot make choice of the fortune of lottery. So P. Elius fell to M. Junius (but before he went into his province, he had in charge to bring into the Senat, those embassies which from all parts were come to Rome for to declare their joy in the behalf of the people of Rome) and Gaul to Q. Cassius.

Albeit such personages were sent, as by whose sage counsel good hope there was, that the chief commanders of the Roman armies would pass no decree unbeseeming either the clemency or Majesty of the people of Rome, yet debated it was in the Senat about the sum and principal points of all their counsels and designs; to the end that the said Legats might carry unto the Generals all things plotted already and begun to their hands at home in the City. In the first place ordained it was, That the Macedonians and Illyrians remain free and enjoy their liberties, that all nations of the earth might see, that the drift of the Roman armies and forces was not to bring free states into servitude, but contrarywise to reduce those that were in bondage to liberty, to the end that those nations which now enjoyed freedom, might be secured under their safeguard and protection. Both of surety and of perpetuity, and such as lived in subjection under the Kings, might both for the present time find their government more mild and righteous, for that respect which the Kings have of the people of Rome, and also, if it fortun'd hereafter, that there should be war between the people of Rome and their Kings, they might be assured that the issue of those wars would bring victory to the Romans, and procure liberty to themselves. Also agreed it was that there should be no more farming out of the metal mines in Macedony, albeit they yielded a great revenue; nor yet of publick lands and possessions in the countrey: for possible it was not that these matters should be practised and followed without publicans; and where those intermeddle & have ought to do then it must needs follow, that either the publick right and prerogative of the State be annulled or the liberty of allies come to nothing. Neither were the Macedonians themselves able to exercise the same: for look where the ministers and managers of any thing see a booty presented before their eyes, there, occasions of sedition and contention will never be wanting. Moreover, concluded it was, that there should be no common and general counsel of the whole nation, for fear lest at any time the lewd vulgar people having by the Senat liberty granted unto them tending unto a good and wholesome moderation and equality of the State should abuse the same and draw it to a malicious and pestilent licentiousness. But they thought it good policy to divide Macedony into four quarters and countries, that each one might have their severall counsel: likewise it was supposed to stand with good reason and equity, that they should pay the one moiety of that tribute which they were wont to yield unto their KK. Semblable commission and like directions they had for Illyricum. As for all other matters referred they were to the discretion of the Generals and the Delegat commissioners, who might be better able to determine more certainly of particulars, according to the occurrents presented unto them in the managing of their affairs.

Among many and sundry Embassadors of Kings, nations, and states, Antalus the brother of K. Eumenes most of all others amply moved mens minds, and drew their eyes upon him: for by them who had born arms together with him in that war, welcomed he was much more heartily, and received with greater courtesy than if Eumenes the K. himself had come. Two occasions there were outwardly pretended, and those carrying a good show of honesty and credit, which brought him to Rome: the one a gratulation or testimony of joy (as meet it was) for that victory, wherein himself lent his helping hand; the other, a complaint of French tumultuous wars and the bloody hostility of Adriatic their King, by which means his brothers Kingdom was in great jeopardy. But there lay another thing hidden underneath, namely, an inward and secret hope that he conceived of honors and rewards from the Senat, which hardly he could seem to aim & reach unto, without some unkindness and violence offered to brotherly duty and affection. For some there were even of the Romans also, who did him no good, but gave him bad counsel, drew on his appetite with fair hopes, hopes, and set him a longing, feeding him with these and such like conceits. That in Rome this was the opinion entertained of Attilius and Emmenus, as if the one of them were a friend and ally sure to the Romans; the other an ally, sound and faithful neither to the Romans nor yet to Per-seus: and therefore hard it were to let down and lay. Whether of the twain would be more easily obtained at the Senats hands, namely, a suit made in his own name for his pretermitt of a demand of some hard course against his brother: to bent were all men in general to grant any thing to At-talus, and to deny every thing to Emmenus. Attilius (as the sequel and proof shewed) was pliant to those persons whose desires reach at all that hope promiseth, had not the sage admonition of one friend come between to bridle his affections, ravished and transported so as they were with the amiable aspect and fawning flattery of his own good fortune. He had about him at that time one Serapinus a Physician, sent by Emmenus (who rested not secure of his brothers loyalty) to Rome, of purpose for to lie in espial and observe all that Attilius did: and to advise him faithfully if he saw him tread awry and practise ought against his duty and allegiance. When he came unto him he found his ears already possessed, and his spirit tempted and solicited beforehand: howbeit taking his times and waiting opportunities, he went roundly to work and stuck to it close, until he had set all up again which was at the point to run on end and fall to the ground. He alledged and laid these remonstrances before his eyes, saying, "That Kingdoms have grown mighty, some by one means, some by others: but as for theise, being but newly erected, & grounded upon no strength of ancient foundations, it stood upright only by the mutual concord of him and his brethren, in that one of them beareth the name and title of King, wearing the diadem and crown alone upon his head, but in effect all three brethren be KK. As for you Attilius (sd. he) who are the eldest brother save one, who is it that reputeth you for less than a King, not only for that he seeth you so mighty at this present, but also the next heir apparant, and without all doubt like shortly to reign indeed? considering the feeble body and craly age of Emmenus, who hath besides no line of children to succeed him in the roial throne? (for as yet he took no knowledge of him that reigned afterwards.) What need then is there to use violence, and to force that which of its one accord will shortly be devolved upon you & fall into your hands? Moreover, a new tempest and storm is risen of French wars, threatening peril unto the realm, which it will be hard for you Princes to withstand, agree as well as you can in all brotherly love, unity and concord. But if to forra in war abroad, there should arise a domestical and civil dissention between you at home, what remedy then but utter ruin and destruction? Neither shall you (Attilius) purchase any good but this, first to prevent that your brother be not King, and then to dilable and disappoint your self of that neer and assured hope you have to be K. But say, that to preserve a Kingdom for a brother, and to wrest a Kingdom from a brother, were honorable and glorious deeds both the one and the other: yet surely of the twain, to have saved a Kingdom deserveth greater commendation and praise, in that it setteth so well with piety and kindness. And certainly seeing the other is a cursed and detestable part even next neighbor to parricide: what scruple and doubt remaineth now which needeth any farther deliberation? For tell me, beseech you, is it one parcel of the Kingdom that you reach at, or shoot you at the whole? If you aim at a part only, then upon the dismemb'ring and distraction of your puillance, you shall be both twain much weak-ned and exposed to the danger of all injuries: if you would have all, what shall become of your brother? Would you with him being your elder, to live a privat person or to far spent in years as he is, a banished man: and namely, with those murtherers of body which he earneth about him, or would you command to take his life away and rid him out of this world at once? Now truly to say nothing of the unhappy and miserable issue of such practices, and wicked brethren delivered unto us in fabled fables, you see what a goodly fall end Perseus is come unto, who being in the Temple of Samothracia was constrained lying prostrate upon the ground, to prostrate himself at the feet of the enemy his conqueror, the crown and diadem which he came to possesse by, even with the unnatural murder of his own brother, as if the Gods in heaven had been there present, to require due punishment for his horrible fact. To conclude, they also themselves, who in no friendly love and affection to you, but in rancor and hatred to your brother Emmenus, have put these designs into your head, and prick you on to execute the same: even they I say, will praise your kindness, your piety and constancy in case you persevere true and trusty to your brother, to the very end. These and such like important persuasions prevailed with Attilius and settled deeply in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senat, after he had wished joy unto them and protested his own for the late victory, he laid abroad and declared his own merits and good service in that war, the favors also (such as they were) done by his brother, and last of all, the revolt of the Gauls lately broken out with great troubles and commotions. His petition to the Senate was, for to send their Embassadors unto them, by whose countenance and authority they might be reclaimed, and to lay arms a de. Having declared this message which concerned the profit in general of the realm, he made a special suit for himself, and demanded to have Carus and Marcus given unto him. And thus, when he had put them besides their hope, who thought verily that after he had accused his brother he would have required the kingdom to be divided bece-meal & dismembred, he departed out of the Council house. Seldom had been known at any time before any man whatsoever, King or subject, to have had the like audience with so great favour and applause of all men, as he: received and entertained he was right honourably with gifts & presents of all sorts whilst he was at Rome, and with the like they accompanied him at his departing.

 Among

Among many Embassies of Syria and Babylonia, the Rhodian Embassadors were most marked and looked upon throughout all the City: for whose sake they were all trim and glossy to be seen in their white and bright apparel, as if it were for them that would seem to congratulate for the victory: for if they had worn black or been poorly arrayed, it might have been construed that they mourned for the misfortune and calamity of Perseus. After that M. Titius, the Consul brake with the LL. of the Senat (not all that while the said Embassadors stood without in the common place Comitium) to counsel and advise, whether they would allow lodging, presents, and give audience in the Senat unto them: they resolved and were of opinion to observe no rights nor customs of hospitality with them. Then went the Consul out of the Senat: unto whom when the Rhodians said that they were come to rejoice in their behalf for the late victory, and wished to answer in the name of their City to certain crimes whereunto they were charged, requesting that they might speak before the Senat and be heard with indifference: the Consul pronounced aloud unto them, That the custome indeed of the Romans was, to entreat their allies and friends graciously, and among other matters of courtesy and hospitality which they afforded unto them, to grant them also a day of hearing in the Senat; but the Rhodians had not demeaned themselves during the war, in such sort, as to be reckoned in the number of lovers and associates. At the hearing of these words they call themselves all prostrate on the ground, beseeching the Consul and all those that were present, not to suffer that false imputations of late furnished should against a reason prejudice the Rhodians more, than their good deserts of old (whereof themselves were sufficient witnesses) stand them in stead. And presently after they had put on simple apparel and mourning weeds, they went about from house to house visiting the principal persons of the City, humbly beseeching them with tears, to hear their cause before they were condemned. M. Fuficius also the Pretor or L. chief justice for the pleas between citizens and strangers, was the only agent that provoked and incited the people against the Rhodians: nay, he had promulgated and published a bill to this effect, That war might be denounced against the Rhodians; also, that one of the Magistrats for that year they would make choice of some one to be sent as Admiral with a fleet for the managing of that war: hoping that himself should be the man. But this religion and proceeding of his was crossed by M. Antonius and M. Pomponius, two Tribuns of the commons. Over and besides, the Pretor, to say a truth, had broached this matter after a new and strange fashion, and to the evil example of future times, in that he preferred a bill unto the people of his own head alone, without asking the advice of the Senat, or making the Consuls acquainted therewith, and that in this manner and form. Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed against the Rhodians? whereas alwaies before-time, in question of war, the Senats advice was first taken, and then the thing was proposed unto the people. Likewise the Tribuns of the commons for their part, did more than they might, and a thing not warrantable by any precedent. For it was a custom and tradition observed ever of old, that no person should interpose his negative to cross any bill, before that privat men in particular had their cause and right granted; both to persuade or dissuade the same; by which means many a time it fell out, that even they who never professed nor meant to oppose themselves; being moved and induced by the reasons of those that stood up to dissuade, and perceiving also by them the inconveniences of such a bill, would step between and dash all: yea, and contrarywise such as came of purpose to cross and wipe the same being convinced by the authority and born down by the important arguments alledged by those that enforced the said bill, would desist and surcease. Thus the Pretors and Tribuns strove much who should do every thing more unseasonably than others. The Tribuns impeached and staid the hastines of the Pretor, interposing their negative before the time, and deferring the matter until the coming of the L. General.

Whether we have transgressed and offended yea, or no, that yet remaineth doubtful: but sure we are of this, that we suffer all punishments and shameful ignominies already that can be devised. Heretofore, when the Carthaginians were vanquished, when Philip, when Antiochus was overthrown, we came to Rome: from our publick lodging provided for us at the charges of the City, we presented our selves (my LL.) into your Councel-house, to testify our great contentment (of your conquests: from the Councel-house we went directly to the Capitol, carrying with us presents and oblations to the honor of your gods. But now we the same Rhodians are come unto your Senat clothed in this poor habit and array, as you see, from out of a base hostility and common inne, where hardly we could have lodging for our money; being commanded in manner of enemies to make our abode without the City walls. We Rhodians (I say) whom but lately ye scolded with the grant of two Provinces, Lycia and Caria, and whom ye graced with all kind of honors, and enriched with all manner of gifts and rewards. You ordain as we hear say, that the Macedonians and Syrians should live free, notwithstanding they were in servitude before they levied war against you. Neither speak we this in envy & repine for any mans welfare and good estate; nay, we acknowledge therein the rare clemency of the people of Rome: and will ye then make the Rhodians off friends, enemies, who during this war did no more but sit and meddle with neither part? Now surely ye Romans are like men that pretend and give out ordinarily, that your wars have good success and speed well, because they be just and righteous: neither do you glory so much in the event and issue thereof, whereby ye are revengers and conquerors, as for the beginning and first enterprises, in that ye undertake them not without good cause. The besieging of Messana in Sicily by the Carthaginians, was the cause that the people of Rome reputed them enemies. The assailing of Athen by Philip, his intent and purpose to bring Greece into servitude, his relieving of Amibal with men and money, caused him likewise to be holden for their enemy. Thus Antiochus brought upon his own head the Roman war, for that he being solicited by the Ætolians your enemies came willingly out of Asia and with a fleet sailed over to Greece: and when he had seized upon Demetrias, Chalcis, and the freights of Thermopyla, went about to dispossess you of the empire. And last of all, Persens by levying arms against your allies, by killing some of their petty kings and princes, by murdering other chief persons of sundry nations and cities, gave you just occasion to make war upon him. But what colourable cause can there be pretended of our calamity, if needs we must miscarry and perish? All this while I make no difference between our cities case and that of Polyaratus and Dion our citizens, even those persons whom we have brought to deliver into your hand. For suppose that the cause were all one, and that we Rhodians were all faulty and culpable alike, what might that crime be for which we are touched in this war? We favoured Persens and that side (you will say) and like as in the war of Antiochus and Philip, we stood with you against those kings, so now we took part with the K against you. Was that all? well, In what sort we are wont to aid our associates, and how lustily to enterprise wars, do but ask of C. Livius and L. Emilius Regillus, the Admirals of your fleets in Asia. Your ships never fought at sea without us: yet we with our Armado alone fought a battail once before Samas, and a second time in Pamphylia against General Anniba: which victory there achieved was unto us by so much more honorable and glorious, for that after we had in an unfortunat fight near Samas lost many of our ships & the very choise and flower of our youth, we nothing terrified and dismayed with so great an overthrow, durst turn again to make head yet, and were so hardy as to encounter the Kings royal navy coming out of Syrin. And all this have I related not by way of boast & to glorify our selves (for we are not now in case to stand upon those terms) but to give you a tale by the way and put you in mind, in what manner the Rhodians have used evermore to succour their confederats. And for the better proof thereof, after the defeat of Philip and Antiochus we received at your hands right great rewards & recompence for our service. In case the fortune of Persens had been so happy as yours is at this present (praised be the Gods for their grace and goodnes & thanked be your own valour withal) and we had come into Macedony to the King upon his victory to require & demand rewards, what could we alledge therefore? Might we say that he had bin maintained by our mony, or relieved with our corn, with land forces, or strength at sea? Was there any place by us kept and held with a garrison for his use, were we able to tell where we fought, either under the conduct of his Captains or upon our own leading and direction? If haply he should demand in what quarters our souldiers kept, in what coast our ships lay inguard for his defence, what could we answer? Peradventure we might plead our cause & excuse our selves in the presence of him, supposed conqueror like as we now do before you here in place. For by sending our Embassadors to and fro unto you as well as to him about a treaty of peace, this is all the good we have got, that in stead of winning the love & favor of both parts, we incur the heavy displeasure of the one; being thus charged with crimes and wrapped in dangers. And yet my good LL and honorable Senators of Rome, Persens might truly object that to us, which you in no wise can, namely, that we in the beginning of the war sent Embassadors to you making promise in our name of whatsoever was needful thereunto: also that we would be ready at all assaies to furnish you with ships strongly rigged and with our youth well appointed like as in the wars afortime. That we performed not these promises of ours, you only were the let and hindrance, who (whatsoever the cause was) refused our offered service & rejected all our succours. Well then, neither have we attempted ought as enemies, nor failed in the duty of good friends and allies: but impeached have we been by you for effecting that which we intended. How now? may some man say: Hath there been nothing done or said in your City (O ye Rhodians) that you wish unsaid or undone, & whereat the people of Rome may justly take exceptions and be offended with you for it? Undertake to justify and make good whatsoever hath been done, I will not, neither have I so little wit I trow, but sever I will the publick cause of the whole state from the privat offences committed by particular persons: for no City is there under the sun, but may otherwhiles have lewd and naughty citizens some or other, and evermore a rude and fortish multitude. I have heard say, that even amongst you here at Rome, some have sought to advance and set themselves aloft by currying favor and flattering the common people: and that the time was, when the commons rose and departed from among you so as the rule of the common weal and people of Rome was out of your hands, as in a very Anarchy. If such a thing as this might chance in this your City (so well qualified & ordered as it is) how can any man make a wonder that among us there have been some, who (affecting and seeking for the amity and friendship of the K) might haply corrupt and seduce our commons with their naughty counsel? And yet when all is said, they prevailed no more than thus, that we sat still and failed in doing our devoir to you: for I will not over-pass in this place the greatest and most grievous crime of all other where with our City is charged during this war, and that is this. At one and the same time we sent Embass, both to you and Persens about a peace. This designment so unfortunat and unlucky as it was, a furious and brainick orator and agent of ours (as afterwards we understood) handled as foolishly: who (as it is for certain known) framed his language in that manner, as if he had been C. Popilius the Roman Embassador, whom ye sent to the two KK, Antiochus and Ptolemus, to warn them both to lay down arms &

N^o success was. But that behaviour of his, (so it what you will, either pride or folly) was no worse before you than it was to K. Perseus. Every City hath their conditions and qualities by themselves, like as particular and several persons: and temblably it is in whole nations, some are testy and choleric, bold and audacious; others again be fearful and timorous: some are given to wine and drunkenness, others to women and wantonness. The people of Athen (by report) are too hasty, hot, and forward to enterprise any thing even beyond their power. The Lacedemonians again, be as slow and backward, casting many doubts & difficulties to enter upon the very things which they are assured of. I cannot deny, but that all the country of Achaia in general breedeth many a mad brain and vain spirit: and I will not say, but that our people are jolly fellows of their tongue and can speak big, for that we seem (among other cities and states bordering upon us) to excel and surpass; and that no so much in the confidence we have of our own forces; as for the honorable regard ye have had of us, and the great testimonies and judgments ye have given out of us. But that foolish embassage of ours even then at the very time had punishment sufficient, being sent away (as it was) with so heavy an answer of yours: and if we were not then disgraced and shamed enough, now surely this present embassage so humble and pitiful, were able to make full satisfaction for a more insolent embassy than it was. All pride (and arrogancy of words especially) choleric persons indeed hate, wise men deride, and namely, from an inferior to his better: but no man ever judged it a mortal sin and worthy of death: many here was all the danger, lest haply the Rhodians might seem thereby to despise the Romans. How then? be there not some also that cannot rule their tongue, but will be railing & uttering blasphemous words against the Gods: yet we never heard of any that have been therefore smitten dead with a thunderbolt.
 C^o What remaineth then for us wherein we should purge and clear our selves, if we neither can be charged in fact with hostility; and if our Embassy hath used some proud and presumptuous words more than became him, which deserve not the total ruin of our City but some sharp checks and hard rebukes on both sides of our ears? But I hear (my good LL.) that in your ordinary talk among your selves when ye are together, we are censured for our inward affection only & secret thoughts, and condemned no less than for some deed, namely, That in heart we favoured the K.
 and wished him rather than you to obtain the victory: and therefore they deem us worthy to be persecuted with fire and sword. Some there be again of you, who think verily that thus indeed we stood affected, howbeit they would not have us for it to be warred upon as enemies: for that it standeth not with the custom or law of any City in the world, That if a man with a mischief to his enemy, he should be straightwaies condemned therefore to die, so long as he hath not en-tred into any action tending thereto. And verily these men we have to thank, who free & quit us yet from punishment, although they clear us not of guilt: howbeit this sentence we pass against our own selves, That if it can be proved, that we were all of us so minded and disposed in affection as we are burdened, (for content we are that all go under one heart and hand, will and deed, without distinction) then let us all be punished for it and feel the smart. But if of the great men and chief among us, some affected you & others the Kings; we require not, that for the love of us who sided with you, the Kings suppose should fare the better and escape clear: but we request and beseech rather, that for their sakes we perish not, and be quit undone. And certainly, E^o your own selves are not worse affected and more set against them than our very City is: which they knowing well enough, most of them either fled away, or else killed themselves: others of them (such as we have condemned and passed judgement against) shall be at your pleasure (my LL.) to do with them what you will. All the rest of us Rhodians, as thanks we have merited none in this war, so we have deserved as little punishment. Lay the over-deal and surpluse of our former good deeds and demerits to this want of duty now, and let the heap of the one make up the scant measure of the other. With three Kings of late years ye have maintained war: let not our slackness and sitting still in this one, codamage and hurt us more, than our devoit and emploiment in the other twain may seem to satisfy and countervail. Set Philip, Antiochus and Per- seus, for three verdicts and sentences as it were passed upon us: two of them acquit us clear: the third is doubtful whether it wil go against us or no. Indeed if they themselves were to sit upon us, we should no doubt be cast and condemned: but you (my good LL.) that are our competent judges determine now at once. Whether there shall be a City of Rhodes remaining upon the face of the earth, or be razed utterly & destroyed from the very foundation forever: for you are not to debate in counsel about making war upon us: which we you may begin and go in hand with at your pleasure: but follow and manage you never shal, because there is not a Rhodian that wil take arms and come into the field against you. Will you not be pacified but persist still in your schools and anger then will we crave at your hands some respite of time, whiles we may go home and upon these how we have sped in this lamentable embassage of ours. And then, all of us iriviously shall be born and of free condition every one, I say, man and woman with all our wealth and substance will embark our selves for sale we will our privat houses and publick edifices: and G^o with Rome straight will we all come: and when we have laid on heaps here in your common hall, and at the porch and entrie of your counsel house, whatsoever gold and silver we have either in privat use or common thist: commit we will to your devotion and metry our own persons, together with the bodies of our wives and children: and sever wil we go further but even here in this place will we suffer and abide what which we have to undergo and endure. Let our City then be sacked, pillied and burned so it be far enough out of our eye that we see it not. The Romans may (if it please them) judge the Rhodians enemies; yet you will give us leave to pass in some sort a doom of our own, that we in our consciences never condemned our selves for such, nor ever will enter in any hostile action against you, come what will, even the utmost extremity that can be suffered. After their oration in this manner uttered, they set down again all prostrate, and as humble suppliant citions, put forth and shook their branches of the olive, until at length they were raised up on their feet, and so departed out of the Senat. Then began the LL. within, to give their opinions, and pass their sentences of them. The heaviest enemies and most maliciously bent against the Rhodians, were those, who had conducted the war of Macedony, as Consuls, Pretors, or Lieutenants; but M. Porcius Cato was their only patron that stood to them and supported their cause right earnestly; a man otherwise by nature severe and severe, but as then he shewed himself a mild and gracious Senator. I will not insert here the lively portraiture and resemblance of that copious and eloquent person, by relating the flowing speech which he then delivered; his very oration is extant in writing, and contained in the fifth book of his Origines. In fine, the Rhodians received such an answer, as they neither were concluded enemies, nor yet remained in the nature and quality of friends. The principal persons of this their embassage, were Philocrates and Asymedes. Ordered it was & agreed between them, that Philocrates (with some of his fellows) should report this answer at Rhodes; and that Asymedes (with the rest) should stay behind at Rome, to know what was practised and done there, and give intelligence thereof accordingly to their citizens at home. For that present the LL. of the Senat gave them in charge, to remove their Captains and Governours by a certain day out of Lycia and Caria. These news related at Rhodes, importing matter (in it self considered) of grief & heaviness, turned into joy, in regard that they were eased from the fear of a greater mischief, for they doubted sore that they should have had hot war. And therefore presently they ordained for the Romans a crown amounting to the value of 20000 pieces of gold, and with this present they sent Theodorus the Admiral of their navy in embassage. A will and desire they had to make suit unto the Romans for association: but so, as no act and ordinance of the people should be entred therof, nor any instrument engrossed as touching it. And this they did, to avoid the greater shame and ignominy of repulse, if haply they missed of their purpose, and could not obtain. The Admiral alone had this priviledg, and was permitted to treat of that matter, without any bill at all either published or enacted by the people. For in so many years before they had continued in amity with the Romans in such sort, as they never linked and tied themselves unto them by any formal deed and covenant upon record, and that for no other reason in the world, but because they would neither cut the Kings off from all hope of their aid, if haply any of them might stand in such need, nor disable themselves of the possibility they had to reap some fruit & receive good of their bounty and prosperity. But surely at this time (me thinks) they ought to have fought sadly and in good earnest for their society, not so much for safety and security against others (for none they feared at all but only the Romans) as to be rid of the suspicion and jealousy which the Romans had of them. About the same time the Carians also revolted from them, and they of Mylas took certain Towns of the Euromestians. Now were the hearts of these Rhodians within the City not so much broken or abated, but they saw well enough that if the Romans took from them Lycia and Caria, all the rest would either by way of revolt put themselves in liberty and shake off the yoke of their subjection, or else be surprised and seized by the neighbour nations bordering upon them; and that then they should be pent up and shut within the compass of a small Isle and the stands of a barren soil, not able to nourish and maintain the inhabitants of so great and populous a City. Therefore with all speed they dispatched and sent forth their youth, and not only forced the Carians (notwithstanding they had joined unto them the aid of the Cybirds) to their obedience, but also in battel beat Orthesia overcome, the Mylasians and Alabandians; who having disseized the Euromestians of their province, advanced jointly with their united armies against them.

Whiles these affairs thus passed there, whiles some occurrents fell out in Macedony, and others likewise at Rome, L. Anicius having subdued King Gentius (as is before said) and brought him under his own hand, placed a garrison in Scodra, the Kings roial seat, and appointed Gabinus the Captain thereof: but in Rhizon and Olcinia, two commodious cities of good importance, he ordained C. Licinius the Governour. Having thus made over the rule of Thyrrheny unto these twain, himself with the rest of the army went into Epirus. Where the Town Phanota was the first that yielded unto him, and the whole multitude of the people came forth to meet him with their intules in token of submission. After he had put a garrison in this place also, he passed over into the countrey of Molossy, where he received the surrender of all the Towns thereof, excepting Passaron, Tegium, Phylacum, and Horreum. And then he led his army first against Passaron. The principal men and rulers of that City were Antinous and Theodorus, men of mark and name, as well for the favor they bare to Perseus, as the hatred they carried to the Romans: the only persons who had counselled and perswaded the whole nation to revolt from the Romans. These two having guilty consciences within them for their privat trespass, and being past all hope of finding any grace and pardon, shut the gates of the City, to the end that they might perish with the overthrow of all, and be overwhelmed with the total ruin of their own country: and therewith they exhorted the multitude to prefer present death before servitude and slavery. No man durst once open his mouth to contradict these so great and mighty persons. At length a certain noble young Gentleman, named also Theodorus, with whom the greater dread from the Romans abroad prevailed more, and overcame the

A the less fear of the rulers at home. "What ail ye my masters (sd. he) and fellow citizens, what rage and madness hauntheth you to enwrap and intertise the whole City in the faine and folly of these two persons? Certainly, I have often heard of men that for their countrey have willingly lost their lives, but to think it meet, that their countrey should perish for them, these are the first that ever were known. Why rather open we not our gates and submit our selves to that empire, into which the whole world besides is subject. As he spake these words, the multitude followed him toward the gates: which when Antinous & Theodotus saw, they made no more ado, but brake upon the first corps de guard of the enemies which they came unto, and exposing their bodies to the swords point, were soon killed, and the Town was yielded into the hands of the Romans. Tegmon also, upon the like wilfull obstinacy of Prince Cephala, had shut their gates, but after that he was slain, the Town was taken by surrender. And neither Phylace nor Horreum would abide the assault. Having thus quieted Epirus, and bestowed his forces by garrisons in diverse commodious Towns for the winter time, he returned into Illyricum: where he held a general Assembly at Scodra, to which he had summoned the principal States of the whole nation, and whither all others were arrived five delegates from Rome. And there in this frequent and solemn session, he pronounced from the Tribunal seat, by the advice of the counsel assistant unto him, That the Senate and people of Rome ordained the Illyrians to live free and enjoy liberty, and that himself would withdraw the garrisons out of their Towns, Fortresses, and Castles. As for the Issians, Taulantians, Tirustians in the Dassaretians countrey, Rhizonits and Olcianats (for that whiles Gentius his fortune stood upright, they had ranged with the Romans) he declared them not only free, but also exempt and privileged from all tributs. The Doarians also, for leaving Caravanius, and passing with their armies to side with the Romans, he endowed with the like immunity. They of Scodra, Dassara, and Selepsia, with the rest of the Illyrians, were to pay the one moiety of the tribute which they had yielded to the King. After this he divided Illyricum into three cantons: the one of them he made of those before named: the second, all the Labeats: and the third, of the Agravonits, Rhezonits, Olcianats, and those that bound and border upon them. Having set down this order in Illyricum, he returned to Passara a City in Epirus; there to lie for the winter time.

While these things hapned in Illyricum, Paulus before the coming of the ten Legats, sent Q. Maximus his son (who was now lately returned from Rome) to the laccage of Eginium and Agasse. The quarrel against Agasse was, for that they having delivered the Town once to Martius the Consul, and therewith of their own accord craved the alliance of the people of Rome, revolted notwithstanding afterwards to Persius. As for the Eginians, they had committed a late and fresh trespass: for giving no credit to the fame that was voiced of the Romans victory, they cruelly handled certain Roman souldiers, who were entred into their City. Moreover, he sent L. Posthumus likewise to espial in hostile manner the City of the Enians, for that they had persisted in arms more busily than the other neighbour Cities. Now was it about that season of the year which men call Autumn: in the beginning whereof, so soon as he had determined to ride a circuit and visit all Greece round, and so see those places whereof there went so great a name, and which were more renowned by hear-say than known by sight of eye: he left C. Sulpicius Gallus for the command and guard of the camp, & let forward in his progress, accompanied with no great train. And being guarded of the one hand with his own son Scipio, and on the other, with Athenaus the brother of King Eumenes, he passed through Thessaly, toward the famous Oracle at Delphos. Where, after he had sacrificed to Apollo, he destined and appointed those Columns & Pillars (which were begun in the porch of that Temple, and whereupon the statues of King Persius should have been erected) for to sustain and bear the statues of himself with the title Victorious. He visited also the temples of Jupiter in Lebadia: where, after he had seen the mouth of that peakish cave into which they use to descend that would have the benefit of the Oracle, and know the will of the Gods; after sacrifice also done to Jupiter and Hercinna, whose temple there is to be seen he went down to Chalcis, to behold the birth of Euripus, and that Island which in times past was united & joined to the firm continent by a bridge. From Chalcis he crossed over to Aulis three miles distant from thence, a port enabled for the rode some time there of Agamemnons fleet, consisting of a thousand sail. Being there, he went to the Temple of Diana, where that King of Kings (Agamemnon) offered his own daughter in sacrifice upon her altar, to have a prosperous voiage for his fleet intending to sail to Troy. After this he came to Oropus a Town in Attica, where Amphilochus the Prophet is worshipped as a God. There, was to be seen an ancient Temple, most pleasant to behold for the goodly fountains and Rivers round about it. Then went he forward to Athenis, a City likewise for antiquity of fame much spoken of, and highly renowned time out of mind: wherein were many monuments also worth the seeing: namely, the citadel, the havens, the walls that reach from the City to Sunius a headland made by great Captains and Commanders, the images of the Gods, and of men likewise, so brave & excellent, as well for the artificial workmanship, as the matter whereof they were made. When he had sacrificed within the City to Minerva the goddess and patroness of the said citadel, he kept on his journey, and the next day following arrived at Corinth. A fair & beautiful City it was in those daies: before it was destroyed, the fortels there and the Isthmus were things of especial mark and worth the sight: for the said fortels notwithstanding it be mounted up to such exceeding height above all yet is it full of fountains; and the Isthmus by a narrow ridge of land divided from sea neeth together, the one lying East, and the other West. From thence he went to Sicyonia and Argos, two noble Cities, and so forward to Epidaurus, nothing in wealth comparable to the rest, yet of great name for the famous temple of Aesculapius, which standeth 5 miles from the City, where at this day are to be seen the marks and tokens of the empty places from whence the oblations have been plucked away: but then a rich place it was and full of those offerings and gifts, which diseased persons had consecrated to that God in recompence and reward for those sovereign salves and wholesome remedies which they there found. From thence he came to Lacedaemon: a City memorable not for any magnificence of stately works and buildings, but for good discipline and orders there observed. From whence passing through Algalopolis, he ascended up to Olympia: where among other things there to be seen, he beheld Jupiter as it were represented even before his eyes, whereat he was much moved in spirit. And therefore as if he had been to sacrifice in the capitol, he commanded a sacrifice to be prepared with more state and magnificence than ordinary. Thus having visited all Graeces over without any search and enquiry made, how men either in general or particular stood affected in the war against Perseus, (because he would not trouble and disquiet the minds of the allies with any fearful occurrent) as he returned toward Demetrias, he was encountred by the way with a number of Esolians all clad in doleful & mourning array. And when he wondred and asked what the matter might be, he was given to understand that 550 of their principal men of name, were by Lyciscus and Tisippus massacred, who with the help of certain Roman souldiers sent from Babius the Governor, had beset their Senat: that the rest were driven into exile: and the goods as well of those who were murdered, as also of the banished persons were now possessed by their accusers. He commanded them to attend upon him at Amphipolis, and when himself had communed & conferred at Demetrias with Cn. Octavius, after he once heard that the ten legats had passed the seas, he laid aside all other affairs, and went directly to Apollonia there to meet with them. To which place when Perseus came to meet him, for he having over-large liberty of poison, was come from Amphipolis & that was a daies journey off: unto the King he shewed good countenance and gave him good and gracious words, but after he was returned to the camp at Amphipolis, he sharply checked and rebuked, as men say, C. Sulpius, first for suffering Perseus to range so loosely and so far off from him, all over the province: secondly, for giving his souldiers so much liberty as to pluck the tiles from off the walls [and houses] of the City to cover the places of their winter harbour: and therewith he commanded that the tiles should be carried thither again where they had them, and the houses to be repaired as sufficiently as before. As for Perseus and his elder son Philip, he delivered unto A. Posthumus to be kept in safe custody: but his daughter and younger son, he sent for to Amphipolis from Samotheace, and used them with all courtesy and kind entertainment as possibly he could. When the day was come, on which he appointed that ten principal burgeses out of every City should repair to Amphipolis, & that all the Kings letters and writings in what place soever to be found, should be sought up & represented there together with all his mony: he sat him down upon the tribunal seat, together with the ten legats from Rome, and the whole multitude of the Macedonians were gathered round about him. Albeit they had been used to subjection under the King, yet this new Tribunal carried with it a form and shew of a terrible government, namely, when they saw the high seats & buisiers to keep the doors and places of entry, the publick crier and the sergeant: strange matters all unto their eyes and ears & where to they had not been accustomed, able to strike a terror to allies, much more then, to conquered enemies. After silence made by the crier, Paulus pronounced in the Latine tongue, what the Senats pleasure was to be done, and what himself with the advice of his Council assistant about him had thought upon and set down: all which points Cn. Octavius the Pretor (for he also was in place) interpreted and related again in the Greek language. Imprimis, they ordained the Lacedaemonians to be free, to have and enjoy the same Cities and territories, to use and exercise their own Laws to create yearly Magistrats, and to pay half of that tribute to the people of Rome, which they used to pay unto their Kings. Item, to divide Macedony into 4 quarters: The one, and that the principal, for to contain all the country between the 2 rivers Strymon and Nessus: to which part there should be laid the tract on the farther side of the river Nessus Eastward (where Perseus held Towns, Castles and Cities) excepting Abnus, Maronea, and Abdera also beyond Strymon Westward all the Bisaltique territory, together with Heraclea, which they call Synice. For the second, all those parts which on the East-side the river Strymon encloseth, except Synice, Heraclea, & the Bisaltas: also on the West, whatsoever is bounded with the river Axius, together with the Paeonians lying to it, who inhabit upon the river Axius Eastward. The third quarter was that, which Axius from the east and Peneus the river from the west do compass, and to the north-side is limited with the mountain Bora, and to this portion was adjoined the tract of Paeonia, which coasteth along the river Axius toward the west: Edessa also and Bithras were annexed thereto. The fourth was beyond the mountain Bora, confining on the one side upon Ilyricum, & on the other upon Epirus. The head cities of every quarter where they should hold their sessions and councils he appointed these: For the first, Amphipolis: The Palaeonea for the second: In the third Pella: & Palaegonia in the fourth. To these places he ordained that by summons they should repair, and hold the assemblies of each quarter: thither the mony to be brought: and there the magistrats to be created. Item, he declared and pronounced that it should not be lawful for any person to contract marriage, neither to have commerce & traffick together in buying or selling of lands or tenements without the limits of their own division. Item, that in their mines they should no more dig for silver and gold: but for Iron and brasse they had permission. And those that had the profit thereof, were to pay the one half of the old rent, which they were wont to yeeld and grant unto the King. Item, he for-

A had them to use any more farraine salt brought from out of other parts. When the Dardanians put in their claim for Pannonia, for that it had sometime been their appurtenance, and also confined upon their country; he pronounced freedom to all those who had been subjects to K. Persius. But afterwards, when they could not obtain Pannonia, he granted unto them the commodity of the traffick for salt; and he charged the inhabitants of the said country to carry it to Sisti in Pannonia, and he set them down a certain price. Item, he debarred them from selling any ship-timber themselves, and from suffering any others. Unto those countries which bordered upon the Barbarians (and except the third quarter all the rest, confined upon them) he granted that they might keep armed garri- sons upon their frontiers and marches. These Acts and ordinances thus published the first day of the session, wrought diversly in the minds of men. Freedom granted beyond their expectation, and the easment in the yearly tribute, comforted their spirits and made them look up. But by the inter- ruption of the commerce & traffick one region with another, they seemed like creatures dismem- bred and plucked under joint-meal, so as having need one of another, yet they had no mutual & reciprocal use and intercourse. In so much as the Macedonians themselves knew full little how big and large Macedony was, and how commodiously it was divided, so as each part was sufficient in it self without the help of others. The first region containeth the Bisaltæ who inhabit beyond the river Nesius and about Strymon, the most valiant men of all the rest; besides, it hath many proper commodities by it self as well fruits of the earth as mines of metals, together with the opportunity and commodious situation of Amphipolis, which as a frontier-bar stoppeth all avenues on the east side into Macedony. The second quarter hath in it two most famous and frequented cities, Thes- salonica and Cassandria & Pallens, a fertile & fruitful land. Besides, the maritime commodities which the havens at Torone and the head of Athos (and it they call the port or rode of Eneas) do yeelds to say nothing of other bayes lying handsomely; some toward the Iland Eubœa, others toward Hellaspont. The third countrey containeth the famous cities Edessa, Berythea and Pella, the warlike nation of the Vetæi, and many Gauls and Illyrians besides who there inhabit, notable men all of action & execution. The fourth region is peopled with the Eordians, Lincestians, and Pelagonians unto whom, the provinces Atintania, Strymonia, and Elimia are adjoynd. All this quarter is cold, rough and hard to dwell in. The nature of the inhabitants is likewise suitable to the soil; the fiercer they are by reason of the barbarous nations their neighbours, who one whole find them occupied with war, and otherwhiles mingle their rites and fashions with theirs in time of peace.

D When Macedony was thus divided and each part distinguished by their severall uses & commodi- ties, he appointed a general review to be made and enrolment of all the Macedonians; having de- clared unto them before, that he purposed to give laws unto them.

This done, the Ætolians were cited and called next; and in the whole course of the commission touching them and their affairs, more inquisition there was, who favoured the Romans, and who affected the King, than of any that either had done or suffered wrong. The murderers were found guilty and absolved, and the banishment of the exiled was as much avowed as their death justified who were massacred: A. Balin only was convicted and condemned, for that he had sent Roman souldiers to execute the said butchery. This issue of the Ætolian cause, posied up the spi- rits of all those who had sided with the Romans, throughout all the nations and cities of Greece; in such sort as they grew to a pride intolerable: but contrarywise put down & abased under their feet, as many as were suspected any waies to have cast a favor and born good will to the King. The principal states-men of their cities were of three sorts: two of them were skillful in the art of so- cialling & either by submitting and subjecting under the Roman Empire, or winding within the fa- vor and friendship of the RK, grew infinitely rich and mighty themselves in privat, with the publick oppression and undoing of their countrey: the third between, sung a mean, and was cross to the other men that stood for the defence of their liberties and maintenance of laws, who as they were more dearly beloved of their neighbours at home, so they were less grations and of credit with strangers abroad. The favorites and supplicants only of the Romans, were advanced by their prosperi- ty; they alone sat in place of government, they were employed in all embassages, and none but they.

F These being there present in great number coming out of Peloponnesus, Ætolia, and from other fre- quent assemblies of Greece, filled the heads of the ten delegats and high commissioners; buzzing into their ears, that not they alone who openly were seen in their braverie and vanity of spirit, vaunting themselves for the hosts and friends of King Persius, but many more besides under-hand took part with him and favoured his proceedings: as for the rest (under a colour of maintaining liberty) practised in all their counsels and conspired against the Romans what they could: and never would the Greek Nations abide long in their allegiance, unless the hearts of that side were taken down and broken; and their authority only cherished, confirmed, and strengthened, who regarded nothing else but the empire and sovereignty of the Romans. When these had informed and presented divers by name: sent for they were by the letters milive of the General; out of Ætolia, Acarnania, Epeiros, and Pannonia, to give their attendance and follow him to Rome, there to answer the cause. But into Achaia two of the high Commissioners were sent, namely, C. Clau- dius and C. Domitius, who personally should summon them by virtue of their edict. And this was done for two considerations: the one, because they thought verily that the Achaians were more considerate and cautious, and therefore would not obey the summons by letters, and any adventure also, C. Claudi and other the informers and accusers who made presentment of their names, should be in some danger of their lives: the other cause why they would be present to give them summons was this, that amongst the Kings records and rolls they had found the letters of the principal Statesmen of other nations: but of the Achæans there appeared no writing at all under their hands, and therefore the imputations charged upon them were nothing evident.

After the Ætolians were dismissed, the nation of the Acarnanians was cited and called into place: as for them, there was no change nor alteration: only Leucas was exempt from doing service to the high court and general assembly of the Acarnanians. As they followed the inquisition still farther and farther, making enquiry who either in publick or private had taken part with the King, they extended their commission as far as into Asia, and sent Labæus to demolish and raze Antissa a City in the Isle Lesbos, and to translate the inhabitants thereof to Methyæna: the pretence was, for that they had given harbor in their haven to the provisions of Antenor the Kings Admiral, at what time as he hovered and ranged about Lesbos with his pinnaces. Two there were that lost their heads, men of quality and great worth, to wit, Andronicus the Ætolian son of Andronicus, for that he followed his father and bare arms against the people of Rome: and Næus a Theban, by whose advice and perswasion they had contracted a society with Persens.

After this enquest of foreign causes interposed and coming between, the assembly of the Macedonians was called again: wherein as touching the state of Macedony, pronounced and published it was, That there should be certain Senators chosen, whom they call Synædri, by whose counsel the common-weal should be managed and governed. After this, were the names read of the principal Macedonians, whom he appointed (together with their children as many as were above fifteen years of age) to go before into Italy. This at first was thought to be an hard and cruel course, but anon it appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians, that it was all done for their liberty. For nominated there were, the Kings friends and gallants of his court, the commanders of armies, the Admirals of the fleets, and the Captains of the garrisons, who were wont to serve the King basely, but to over-rule others proudly and imperiously: some exceeding rich and wealthy, others spending above the proportion of their revenues and living: all faring at their table, and arrayed in apparel like KK, not one carying with him the civil mind of a good citizen, nor one that could abide to hear of laws, or of equal liberty. All these therefore, who had been employed in any ministry or service about the King even they also who had been used in the least embassages that were, had commandment to depart out of Macedony and to go into Italy: and look who obeyed not this edict, were threatened with death. Unto Macedony he gave laws, with such diligent care and good regard, as if he had reckoned them not for enemies vanquished, but for allies of good desert: such laws (I say) as the very practise and tryal of long time (the only corrector of all statutes) was not able upon that experience, to check and control.

After these serious affairs were finished, he exhibited with great furniture and preparation, a solemnity of game and disport at Amphipolis, which long before he had intended, and for the intimation whereof he had both sent out his messengers to the States of Asia and to the KK, and also himself in his circuit and visitation of the Grecian Cities, had given warning to the great men and principal citizens. And thither repaired out of all parts of the world, a number of cunning, dextrous, and artificial actors, that made profession of such plaies and pastimes: besides a sort of wrestlers, champions, and brave horses of the best kind & breed. Also divers embassages with their beasts for sacrifices, and whatsoever else was usually done of custome, at the great and solemn games in Greece. Thus it came to pass, that men admired not only his magnificence, but his wisdom also in exhibiting these shews and fights, wherein the Romans at that time were altogether rude and ignorant. Moreover, he feasted and banquetted the Embass in the same sumptuous manner and respective consideration. And this (by report) was an apophthegm and common saying of his, That none could make feasts and set forth plaies better than he who had the skill to win a field. Having represented their solemnities of all sorts, and bestowed all the brazen shields on shipboard; all other armor and weapons of sundry kinds, he piled upon a mighty heap, and after his prayers made to Mars, Minerva, Jane Luna, and other Gods and Goddesses, unto whom of right and duty appertained to consecrate and dedicate the spoils of enemies; himself (the General with his own hands put under a burning torch, and kindled the fire, and after him all the martial colonels standing round about, cast every man his fire-brand, and set all a burning. This was a thing noted in that great assembly of Europe & Asia where there was such a confluence of people from all parts, as well to testify their joy in his behalf as to see the shews and disports: in that meeting, I say, of so great numbers of sea-fightors and land-fighters, there was that plenty of all things and cheapness of venials, that Emilius the General, of that exceeding store and abundance, gave much away freely to privat persons, to cities and nations, not only for their present use, but also to cary home with them into their countries. And this multitude there assembled, took not more pleasure either in beholding the stage-plaies acted, or seeing men practise feats of bodily strength and activity, or the running of horses to the race, as in viewing the Macedonian booty and pillage laid all abroad to be seen: namely, of statutes, and painted tables, of rich cloth of tissue, of vessels in gold or silver, in copper, and iron, most curiously wrought in that royal seat and City of Pella, not only to serve for a present shew and no more, like those that the Kings Palace of Alexandria was replenished with, but also for continual and everlasting use. These were all embarked, and committed to the charge of Ca. Octavian to be transported to Rome. Pentus after he had given the Embassadors a grand and courteous farewell, bailed over the River Strymon, and lodged within a mile of Philippi. From thence he unloosed and journeyed until he came on the fifth day as far as Philippi.

13 Cities there be of that name.

A Pellus: And passing by the City, he abode two daies at a place which they call Spezium, and then he sent P. Nasica, and Q. Maximus his own son, with part of the forces in an expedition, to give the war unto those Illyrians, who had succoured Perseus in his wars, but he commanded them to meet him at Oricum. Himself marching toward Epirum, at the fifteenth remove arrived at Passaron. Not far from thence lay Anicium encamped: unto whom he dispatched his letters, so the end that he should not be troubled at those designs which were to be put in execution; signifying therein that the Senat granted to the army the pillage of all the Cities of Epirum, which had revolted unto Perseus: which done, he suborned certain Centurions, and sent them into all the Towns with instructions, to give out that his coming was to withdraw all the garrisons from thence, with an intent that the Epirots should enjoy their freedom as well as the Macedonians; & so he summoned out of every City ten of the chief to repair unto him. And when he had charged & commanded them to bring abroad into the market place all the gold and silver which they had, he sent out certain cohorts and companies of souldiers to every of the said Cities: they who were assigned for the places farthest remote went before them, which were appointed to the nearer; and this was ordered so, that upon the same day they should enter into them all at once. Now the Colonels and Centurions had their errand delivered them, what to do. In the morning he times all the gold and silver was brought forth together accordingly, and that at the fourth hour of the day a signal was given to the souldiers to fall to ransack and rife the Cities. Wherein they found so great store of pillage, that every horseman had for his part * 400 Denarii, and the footmen 200 apiece, and a hundred and fifty thousand poles were led away into captivity. Then the walls were rased of the said Cities thus spoiled, and those were to the number of seventy. All the booty and prizes were sold, and out of that mass of money were the souldiers paid. From thence Paulus went down to the Sea side, unto Oricum. But the souldiers minds were nothing so well satisfied, as he supposed they had been, for discontented mightily they were and angry, that they had no share at all in the Kings pillage and treasure, as if they had made no war in Macedony. At Oricum he found those forces which he had sent under the conduct of S. Nasica and Maximus his son: there he shipped his whole army, and sailed over into Italy. In like manner a few daies after, Anticius, when the session and general meeting of the other Epirots and Acarnanians was ended, having given commandment, that their principal persons should follow him into Italy (the knowledge and deciding of whose causes he reserved and referred thither) himself attended the ships which the army had used in Macedony, and passed over likewise into Italy.

D At what time as these affairs were thus managed in Macedony and Epirum, the Embassadors who had been sent with Attalus, to end the war between the Gauls and King Eumenes, arrived in Asia. A surcease of arms for the winter time, was agreed upon between both parties during which cessation the Gauls departed home, and Eumenes was retired to Pergamus there to winter, where also he lay grievously sick. The spring was no sooner come, but the Gauls began to stir and took abroad: but by that time they were come as far as the Synada, Eumenes had assembled his forces from all parts to Sardis. There at Synada, the Romans parted with Saluvstinus the General of the Gauls: Attalus also went with them: but thought good it was not, that he should enter within the Gauls camp, for fear of stirring coals in heat of argument, and raising choles of the one side or other. So P. Licinius communed with the Duke of the Gauls also said: and when he had done he brought word back, that the more he was entreated, the worse he was and less tractable: inso-much as it might seem a wonder, that the words of the Roman Embassadors were so powerful and effectual with Antiochus and Ptolemy (two mighty and puissant Kings), as to make peace so presently between them, since they prevailed so little or nothing at all among the Gauls.

E To return again to Rome. First, the two captive Kings, Perseus and Gernius were sent thither, and committed there to ward they and their children: after them the multitude besides of prisoners, then consequently those Macedonians, as also the other chief pieces of Greece, who were wanted to repair unto Rome. For not they only were summoned to make appearance there, who had been seen present in place, but also all those were sent forth by letters missive contemptuously, who were but reported to have been with the Kings. Then Paulus himself a few daies after embarked in a ship of the Kings: a Gallacee of a mighty bigness, making way with sixteen banks and rowes of oars to a side, and she same set out and adorned with the Macedonian spoils, not only of brave gorgeous armours, but also of rich hangings, tissue, & cloth of gold out of the Kings wardrobe came up the Tyber against the stream, where great numbers of people went forth to greet him, and filled the banks on both sides of the river. Some few daies after Antonia and Octavia arrived also with their fleet. And to all three, by an act of the Senat was triumph granted. Q. Cassius the Pretor had commandment to deal with the Tribunes of the Common by a trans from the Senat, that they should present a bill unto the common people, that those things should be in full commission of command and government that day when they were to ride triumph into the City. See how mean things escape the reach of envy, but the highest commendations are arrogated. No doubt was made at all of the triumph of Anicium, nor yet of Octavia. But Paulus, with whom even they themselves would have been abashed to compare, could not avoid the backbiting of slanderous & malicious tongues. His souldiers according to the ancient discipline of war, he had held hard to their service: and so them had he given a donative indeed out of the booty, but more sparingly & with a lighter hand than they hoped for, from out of so great wealth and riches of the Kings: and yet in good faith to say a truth, full well he knew that if he had satisfied their greedy desire, and dealt still amongst them till they had cried Ho, he should have left himself just nothing as he brought it into the common treasury. So that all this Macedonian army gave a shout by this time, as if they had but cold devotion to their General, either to appear, or to give their voices for the setting forward of the bill aforesaid, as touching his triumph and plenary power of command, when the day of assembly should come. Over and besides, Ser. Sulpicius Galba, who had been a martial Colonel in the second legion, in Macedony, and in private enmity with the General: both himself in person was in hand with him, and by the souldiers also of his own legion solicited and spurred on the rest to appear in sufficient number, there for to give their suffrages against him, and check the bill saying, "That as he was an imperious and Lordly commander, so he was as miserable a pinch-penny withal, and a good deed it were to deny his grace and to cross the law proposed for his triumph, & so to be revenged of him thoroughly: for no doubt the commons of the City would go that way that they should see the souldiers to lead before. He could not forthwith (say they) give money among his souldiers liberally: well, he shall surely know, that his souldiers yet can give him honour: but never let him look for the fruit of favor and grace, where he hath de-ved none. These words set them agog: and when Tib. Sempronius, a Tribune of the Commons read out and published the foresaid bill in the Capitol, and that by permission of law any private person might have spoken thereto, and no man came forth, as being a matter whereof no doubt & question was to be made: then Servius Galba suddenly stepped forth, and required of the Tribune, That (forasmuch as it was so far forth dayes, as being the eight hour thereof, so that he had not time enough to declare and shew at large, what allegations he had why they should not grant L.

Emilius a triumph) they would adjourn the assembly to the next day, and betimes in the morning set the matter on foot again: for that he had need of a whole day and no less, to plead that cause to the full as he should do. But when the Tribune willed him again to speak his mind that day, if he had ought to say, he made a speech, and with his long oration held the court until it was within night: putting them in mind and alledging, "How precisely and rigorously he had exacted at their hands all military duties; how he had imposed upon the souldiers more painful and dangerous labour than need was: but contrary-wise in dealing rewards and bestowing honourable recompences for good service, he was over-straight-laced & too short in every point:
 and verily souldiery and warfare, if it continued still under such Captains, will be more hard, traveltome, and tough to souldiers and warriors: but when all is done and victory obtained, rewarded it shall be with bare poverty and neglect of honour. Certainly, the Macedonians are in better case yet than the Roman souldiers. But if they would be present in great frequency the next morrow, so to deny and revoke this bill, then these rich and mighty men shall know full well, That all lieth not in the hands of the Captain and Commander, but that the souldiers also can do somewhat. The souldiers animated and induced with these perilous words, resorted the day following in so great multitudes, and pestered the whole Capitol so full as none but they could come in to give their voice. The first tribes that were called in, clearly called the grace: which when the principal and chief men of the City saw they ran all into the Capitol with open mouth crying out upon this indignity offered, That L. Paulus a conqueror in so great and dangerous a war, should be deprived of his due triumph: and the grand Commanders and Generals of the field were now subjected and entailed to the loose licentiousness and greedy avarice of their souldiers. In this one thing (say they) have we too too much faulted, such hath been our favours and partiality, and so loth have we been to displease any: but what will become of us in the end if souldiers once may come to be Lords and masters, and thus to crow over their Generals? And every man raised and cried out upon G. M. In the end after this garbail was appeased, M. Servilius who sometime had been Consul and great master of the horse under the Dictator, requested the tribunes that they would begin all again annulling that which was past, and give him leave withal to make a speech before the people. The Tribunes went aside to consult of this matter, and in fine, over-ruled with the authority and countenance of the nobles and peers of the City, began to treat afresh and go in hand with all matters, and making it known openly that they would recal back those first tribes, in case M. Servilius and other private men who were willing to utter their mind to the cause had once spoken. Then said Servilius as followeth, "Masters and friends, citizens here of Rome, if and why nothing else might be judged how singular & how excellent a Commander L. Paulus was in the field, his army (if there were no more) may suffice, that having with him such seditious and light-headed persons for his souldiers, and an adversary of his own among them, so noble of birth, so rich of fortune, and withal so arrogant and self-contented, ready to in the end stir up multitude to commotion, yet troubled he never was with any mutiny at all in his whole army.
 The same severity it was in government & conduct that held them in law and good order, which now at this present they have & detain. And so long as they were managed by ancient discipline, they durst not quarrel nor give offence: As for Servius Galba if (like a new recruit who is to show the first proof) to give the day and basket of M. Emilius he would have made choice of L. Paulus to begin withal and salute him at the bar, he should not yet have trusted his triumph, which (if there were nothing else to dissuade and draw him back) the Senate had judged to be just & due: but the morrow after his triumph (when he had fresh with a private man) he might have given presentment of his name, & by order of law manifested his arrogances unto him and so ended process: or rather he might have said a little longer, boldly, that himself had been a Magistrate in place, and then have gone roundly to work, arrested him upon an action

The Oration of M. Servilius
 in the behalf of Paulus.

A to answer at aday, and so accused him judicially before the people. Thus should L. Emilius have H had his triumph for reward and recompence of his well-doing, in that so nobly & valiantly he had conducted this war: thus likewise should he have suffered condign punishment, if he had committed ought unworthy either of his ancient glory or this new honor. But will you have the truth? which he could find no matter of crime to reproach him with, he fought by waies and indirect means to detract his well deserved praises. He demanded yesterday, one full day to accuse L. Paulus: and * four hours, even all the day time that was left he spent in making an incedive against him. What prisoner was there ever brought to the bar so culpable and sinful, but all the faults of his whole life might be ripped up, deciphered, and painted forth in so many hours space?
 But what objected he all that while, that L. Paulus if he were to frame his defence, would wish B to deny? O that some man would procure me here for the while two assemblies and courts, the one of Roman souldiers employed lately in Macedony the other more pure and uncorrupt of the twain, namely, of citizens sounder in judgment, void of all favor, & cleer from hatred. And the people of Rome I would have to be the judge. First, let Paulus be accused in the grand assembly & court of these citizens. Tell me, O S. Gellus, what would you say against him before those Quirites of Rome. For there you should have been cut off and lost all this discourse & special part of your oration, carrying these terms, You looked too streightly & precisely to the corps de guard in their stations; you held the souldiers too hard to their watch and ward; the sentinels were neerly and narrowly looked unto; & you were over curious about going the rounds & relieving the watch, C in the night season; about the works and fabricks you put the souldiers to more toiling & im-bil- ing than heretofores whiles you, my L. General, their surveior, over-seer, and task-maker, rode all about to exact the utmost with all extremity: in one & the same day when you had the army on foot, presently from a journey you led them forth to battails: when the victory was got, you would not suffer the souldier to breath and take repose, but caused him to march immediatly & to follow the enemy in chase; also, whereas the booty to be parted & shared out might have enriched your self, yet will you carry the Kings treasure in shew of triumph & then lay it up in the chamber of the City. As these be shrewd matters, like sharp goads to prick those souldiers & let D them on, who think they have not scope enough to serve their dissolute looser, or too small allowance to content their covetous appetits: so, with the people of Rome they would have nothing at all prevailed: who if they should not call to mind examples & stories of old, which they have heard their fathers talk of, namely, what overthrowes have been received through the indulgence and popularity of Generals; and contrarywise what victories have been achieved by their severe discipline and government: yet at leastwise they cannot chuse but remember what odds & difference there was in the late Punick war, between M. Minutius General of the horse, and Q.
Fabius Max. his Dictator. And therefore since the accuser might know all this, the defence of Paulus in this behalf was altogether needless and unnecessary. Let us go now to the other audience, and assembly of the Macedonian souldiers. But now me thinks I must not call you Quirites any more, but souldiers: if haply there be so much grace in you, as that this name yet may cause you to blush, & be abashed for very shame of the world, to offer abuse unto your General. And verily E for mine own part, I find a great change in my self, & am otherwise affected in my mind, now that I seem to speak unto an army of souldiers, than ere-whiles I was, when my Oration was at-commodate and framed to the commons of a City. Now souldiers, what say you to the matter?
 Is there any one at Rome (but Perseus again) that would not have a triumph over the Macedonians? & are you not ready to pull such a one in pieces with those very hands, wherewith you vanquished the Macedonians? He, whosoever he is, that impeacheth you for entering into the City in triumph, trust me truly, would have debarred you of victory if it had bin in his power. Lo, how foully are ye deceived (souldiers) and far out of the way, if ye think that the triumph is the honor only of the General, and not of the souldiers likewise, and consequently of the whole people of F Rome. This is not Paulus his case alone. Many others likewise there have been, who when they could not obtain triumph at the hands of the Senate, triumphed nevertheless upon the Albane mountain. As impossible it is for any man to bereave L. Paulus of the honor due for the finishing of the Macedonian war, as it was to disappoint C. Lutatius of his glory for ending the first Pu-nick war, P. Cornelius for the second; or others besides who after them triumphed. It is not a triumph that can make L. Paulus better or worse, either the greater captain or the less. Herein consists the credit, renown & reputation of the souldiers and of all the people of Rome more than his: for fear lest they be reputed & noted either forenvious & malicious, or else unthankful for their best members & noblest citizens; & therein seem to imitate the people of Athens, who evermore persecute and plague with envy their best men that live amongst them. Your ancestors and forefathers when time was (faulted this waies enough I wis) in the perion of Camillus, whom they offered abuse unto, before the City by his means was recovered out of the Gauls hands. Much you G were to blame your selves here & overmuch too in P. Africanus. That in Liternum, his misson, house and place of habitation (who was the conqueror of Africa) should be shewed: that in Liternum (I say) the sepulchre of P. Africanus should be seen. Let us blush for very shame, that L. Paulus, as he is equal to them in glory and honor, should likewise go with them and have his part of your hard and wrongful dealing. The first thing that ye do then, let be this Out with this spot & stain of infamy which ye have caught; so reproachful in regard of other nations, so hurt-full to your selves. For who wil ever hereafter wish to be like Africanus? who will endeavor to resemble L. Paulus in a City so unthankful, say, so spiteful and malicious to all good men? Say if there were no question at all of infamy and obloquy, but of honor only and reputation, tell me if I beseech you) is there any triumph that comprises not the glory also of the Roman name? So many triumphs over the Gauls, so many again over the Spaniards, and so many over the Canthabrigians, are they reputed and called the triumphs of the Captains alone, and not likewise of the people of Rome? And like as we say, that we triumphed not over Pyrrhus only, nor over Antiochus but over the Epirots likewise and the Carthaginians: even so neither M. Curius alone, nor P. Cornelius, but the Romans also have triumphed. True it is, and I must needs say, that the soldiers have a proper interest and part by themselves, in that they alone (dight with branches and chaplets of laurel, and every one bravely to be seen and adorned with the gifts that have been given them) resound in Triumph, Triumpe, and as they pass along the City sing and chant the praises of themselves and of their Captain-Generals. And if it fortune at any time that the soldiers be not brought home out of the province to the triumph, they grumble & are discontented: yet notwithstanding, absent though they be, they think it is their due: and so long as their General and leader triumpheth, they triumph also, because the victory was achieved by the strength of their arms. Good soldiers, if a man should ask you, for what intent you were reconducted into Italy: and wherefore so soon as the service was performed and the war brought to an end, ye had not presently your congys of discharge? moreover to what purpose ye came by companies and squadrons under your ensigns and colors: for what cause ye stay and remain here, and go not every man his waies to his own home? what answer would ye make else, but, That ye would be seen in triumph? And to say a truth, since ye have won the victory and are conquerors, I cannot blame you may ye ought to desire for to be seen and seen again. It is not long since we triumphed over Philip (this mans father) and over Antiochus likewise: and reigned both they did as KK, when the triumph was: and shall there be no solemnity of triumph over Perseus, taken prisoner and brought captive with his children into the City? If L. Paulus, standing beneath as a privat person, one amongst the company of gowned citizens, seeing L. Anicius and Cn. Octavius arrayed sumptuously in cloth of gold, and in their rich purple robes and mantles of estate, mounting up the Capitol in their triumphant chariots, should ask them the question and say in this manner: Tell me, O Lucius Anicius and you Cn. Octavius, judg ye in your own conceit that you are more worthy of a triumph than I? They would no doubt come down each one out of his chariot and yield him their place, yea, and for very shame deliver up all their ensigns and ornaments unto him. And you Quirites, had you rather see Gentius than Perseus led in triumph? would you wish indeed to triumph for an accidental appendant only of the war, rather than for the main substance of the war? Shall the legions coming out of Sclavonia, and the mariners at sea, enter the City crowned with laurel garlands: and the legions out of Macedony, being denied their own triumph stand still and behold others to triumph? Moreover, what shall become of this rich booty? what shall be done with the spoils of that great and wealthy victory? where shall be bestowed and laid up so many thousand coslets and armors plucked from the bodies of enemies slain? Shall they be sent back again into Macedony? Those costly images of gold, of marble of ivory: those goodly fair pictures: those pretious clothes and hangings of purple, scarlet, and tissue: that mighty quantity of gold and silver wrought into vessels chased and engraven: that huge mass of the Kings mony and coin, what shall we do with it? What shall it be carried all by night as stollen goods into the publick treasury and City Chamber? The goodliest sight of all the rest, what say you to it? A most noble & puissant King is taken prisoner, where shall he be shewed to the people of Rome his conqueror? What turning, what concourse there was of people to see K. Syphax captive (& yet he was but an accessory to the Punnick war) most of us do well remember. Shall K. Perseus then, a prisoner and captive: shall Philip and Alexander his sons, (persons of so great name) be hidden and kept from the sight and eyes of the City? And there were no more but L. Emilius himself, twice Consul, the conqueror & subduer of Greece, all men would desire to see him, enter the City in his triumphant chariot. We created him Cos. for this intent that he should finish and determin this war, which to your dishonor and great shame had hung for the space of 4 years. To him then, who (at what time as the lot of that province fell unto him, and when he departed on his voyage from Rome) had all our hearts to presage victory and triumph, shall we now deny triumph when he hath the victory? And verily in so doing, we shall not only defraud men, but rob the gods also of their honor: for due it is to the very gods also, and not to men alone. Have not your ancestors ever used to enterprize all great affairs in the name of the gods first, & therein also to end last? The Cos. or Pretor, when he is to take his journey into his province, or to levy war, with his Lictors before him clad in their coats of arms, is ever wont to make his solemn vows in the Capitol: after he hath acquit himself of his charge and obtained victory, when as he triumpheth, he transferreth in pomp the rich presents of the people of Rome so well deserved, and offereth them to the same gods in the said Capitol, unto whom there first he pronounced his vows. And the beasts for sacrifice going before the pomp of triumph, are not the least part of this solemnity: that it may appear, how the General in his return is mindful of the gods, & rendereth thanks unto them for the happy managing of the affairs of Common weal. As for those beasts for sacrifice which he hath appointed to be shewed in the pomp of triumph, slay them: neither makes it matter whose hand doth in some kil one & some another, but those sacred viands of the Senat, which are not to be eaten in any privat house, nor in publick place unhallowed, but

A "but only in the Capitol: and there, not for the pleasure of men, but of God and men together, "will ye trouble and impeach at the suggestion of Servius Galba? Shall the game be thus against "the triumph of L. Paulus? shall Perseus King of the Macedonians, with his children and the mul"titude besides of captives, with the spoils of the Macedonians, be left behind at the river side?
"shall L. Paulus go directly from the City gate home to his house as a private person, like one that "hath been abroad in the countrey to see his farm, and is newly returned? But thou Centurion and "thou souldier, give ear, I advise thee, to the ordinance which the Senat hath decreed as touching "the General Paulus, rather than to the vain speech of Serv. Galba: hearken to this, that I say the "word, rather than he. As for him, he hath learned nought else but to prate and talk, and that to "the depraving of others full maliciously. I tell thee, fought have I with mine enemies even upon

"combat with me, I never failed but carried away their spoils: I bear the marks about me of many

"my body. At which word, they say, he bared his naked skin, and related withal in what baselie "had received this or that wound. Now as he shewed these scars, and chanced to discover some "parts that better I wis and more honestly had been unseen, and therewith, a * bunch or swelling
"of a rupture that he had in his groin, wherat some of them that stood next unto him took up a "laughter, then (sd. he) even this that you have espied here, and make such game at, I caught with "a train, riding continually as I did, and never from my horseback day nor night: and no more
"ashamed I am and displeased with my self for that infirmity, than for these scars which you here
C "see: since that it never was any impediment unto me in performing my service to the Common"weal, either in civil affairs of City, or in warfare abroad. Well, I an old servitor, have been, con"tent here to shew unto yong men and raw souldiers, my body, many a time and often hacked,
"pierced and slashed with the sword. Let Galba now lay bare that whole skin of his own so slick "and fair. Now my masters, you that are Tribuns, call the tribes again to the Centurins, and take "their voices. As forme [down] I will, and go after the souldiers hard at heels. Know I will which "wars by mutinous persons, than serve under the martial discipline of their General. * * *

Valerius Antius reporteth, That the sum of all the gold and silver taken in pillage and carried in the pomp of this triumph, amounted to the worth of 20 millions of Sesterces. Which maie, no doubt, riseth much greater by the proportion of the number of wains, and the poies both of gold and silver by the same author set down in general sums. And as some have recorded he either spent in the war next before, or else scattered and lost in his flight when he made hie to Samo- thrace, as much again as that came to. And the more wonder it was, that so mighty a mass of money had been gathered and heaped up within thirty years after the war between Philip and the Romans, raised part out of the issue and income of his mett mines, and part out of other profits and tributs. Thus Philip very bare of money, and Perses contrary-wise exceeding rich, began to make war with the Romans. Last of all, Paulus himself rode in his chariot, carrying a great port and majesty with him, both for his comely and personable body, and also for his reverent old age.
After his chariot, among other honorable personages rode his two sons, Q. Maximus and P. Scipio.
Then followed the horsemen by troops, and the footmen by their cohorts and companies, every one keeping their ranks full decently. The footmen had given them a hundred Sesterces apiece, the Centurions double, and the horsemen triple so much. And it is thought, that he meant to have given the footmen as much as the most, and to the rest in proportion, in case they either had not denied his honour by their voices, or if in token of thankfulness and joy, they had but willingly and cheerfully shouldered when this yoke which they received was pronounced and related unto them. And not Perses alone (led as he was through the enemies City in chains before the triumphant chariot of the conqueror) but also Paulus himself the conqueror glittering in glorious in his cloth of gold and costly purple, was a mirror to the world in those few daies, of the transitory and mutable state of mans life. For of those two sons, whom (after he had given the other two by way of adoption from himself) he kept alone at home as heirs to bear his name, to maintain the sacred rites and sacrifices of his family, and to uphold the house itself, the younger, Scipio, being under twelve years of age, five daies before his triumph died; and the elder full fourteen years old and more departed within three daies after the triumph. Which two youths indeed ought to have been armed in their embroidered robes of purple, and so to have ridden in the chariot with their fathers, predestining and aiming to themselves the like triumphs another day.
Some few daies after, M. Antonius Tribune of the Commons assembled a solemn audience of the people for his sake, wherein when after the manner and custom of other Generals he should discourse of his own exploits and worthy deeds, he made them a memorable Oration and well becoming a Noble Roman Prince, to this effect, Which I suppose (quoth he) my neighbors and friends, the citizens of this Noble City, you be not ignorant, both how happily I have succeeded in well publick and also how unfortunately within these few daies two of my children have lost their private hopes in having one while he should be gloriously free and pomp of my triumph remain the one, and seen another while the world to be as and be equall of my two sons to be him the other, yet I be not your master as with this negligence of heart and affection
I thought to make a brief composition between my two young men, and for one, and my publick felicity of the City. At my departure from Italy, I loosed from Brundisium, and set up sail at the sun-rising: by the ninth hour of the same day I arrived safe with all my ships at Corfu. The fifth day after I came to Delphi, where I sacrificed unto Apollon, for my self, for your armies and your navy. From Delphi I departed, and within five daies was in the leaguer. Whereafter I had received the charge of the army, and altered some things which might greatly have hindered the victory, I marched forward, for that the enemies camp was inexpugnable, and the King could not be forced by any means to fight: and piercing through his guards that kept the passage, I went as far as Petra: so as by this means having perforce drawn the King to fight, I vanquished him in plain field and ranged battell. Macedony I subdued, and brought it in subjection to the people of Rome. Finally, that war which for four years together other Consuls before me so managed, as each one left it ever to his successor worse than he found it, I achieved, and brought to a final end in fifteen daies. I followed then in this train other prosperous affairs, as the fruits ensuing of that victory. For all the Cities of Macedony yielded unto me. The Kings treasure I seized upon: the King in person (as if the very Gods themselves had delivered and put him into my hands) I took prisoner, with his sons in the Temple of the Samothracians. But then my heart misgave me, and even then I suspected the surpassing favour of my good fortune: then cast I doubts, and began to fear the dangers at sea, having so mighty a mass of the Kings treasure to transport, and my victorious army to reconduct back into Italy. But seeing all things fall out to hearts desire, a prosperous voyage, a safe arrival, and whatsoever I could pray for at the Gods hands: this I wished in my heart, (as knowing full well the wonted manner of fortune, when she is at the highest pitch, to turn back again and come as fast down) that mine own house, rather than the Common-weal, might feel that change and alteration whensoever it came. And therefore I hope that this so notable a calamity of mine own, shall excuse the City for having any other misfortune, since that my triumph (as it were to check and mock the changes of this world) hath fallen so just between the funerals of my two sons. See how I and Perseus are represented above all others for two notable examples of the frail and unstable condition of man. Lo how he, who being a prisoner himself, saw his sons likewise led captives before his face, hath them yet living sound and safe: and I, who have triumphed over him, came from the burial of one of my sons to ride in my chariot up to the Capitol, and from thence descended again to find the other lying at point of death: neither is there of all that fair issue that I had, one left to bear the name of L. Paulus Emilius. For two of them the house of the Cornelii and the Fabii have, unto whom I gave them in adoption, as out of a great race and breed of children: so as now, in the family of Paulus there is not one left but himself. Howbeit for this calamity and ruin of my house, your felicity and the happy estate of the City is a great comfort and consolation again. These words delivered with such a magnanimity, troubled the spirits of the auditors, and alienated them more, than if he had lamentably moned himself unto them with piteous tears, for his childless estate and desolate condition.

C. Octavius solemnized his naval triumph over King Perseus the first day of December: in which solemnity, he neither had prisoners led in show, nor spoils carried in pomp. He gave to his mariners and sailors seventy and five Denarii apiece: to every pilot double, and to the ship-masters four times as much. After this, the Senat assembled, and the LL. ordained, That Q. Cassius should lead King Perseus with his son Alexander, together with his train that accompanied him, as also bring all his money and goods, silver, or what moveables and furniture soever he had to Alba, there to be kept in sure custody. And the Kings son of Thrace, with the hostages was sent to Caracoli, there to lie in safe ward. As for the rest of the captives who had been led in triumph, thought good it was they should be clapt up fast in prison.

Some few daies after these things, there arrived Embassadors from Corys King of the Thracians, bringing with them money for the ransom of his son and the other hostages. Into the Senat they were brought: where, by way of presamble they laid this for the ground of their speech, That Corys had not sided with King Perseus in the war, upon his own motive and accord, but was compelled to give hostages: then they besought the LL. of the Senat to suffer them to be redeemed at what price soever they would set down, were it never so high. Unto whom this answer was returned by authority of the Senat, That the people of Rome bare well in mind the amity which they had with Corys, with his progenitors, and the whole nation of the Thracians. As for the giving of the hostages, it was rather an evidence to prove, than an argument to excuse their trespass and fault: considering that when Perseus was quiet, the Thracian nation stood in no fear and awe of him, much lesse then when as he was troubled and occupied in war with the Romans. Howbeit although Corys preferred the favour of Perseus before the friendship of the people of Rome, yet they would consider of the matter, and respect more his quality and what was meet for his estate, than his desert and what he was worthy to have, and therefore they would release his son and the hostages, and send them home again. As for the people of Rome, their manner is to bestow their favours and benefits freely without regard of recompence the worth and estimation whereof they had rather leave to the consideration and minds of the receivers, than require and demand the same presently. So there were Embassadors nominated to reconduct the hostages into Thrace to wit, T. Quintius Flaminius, C. Lucinius Nerva, and M. Ciminus Rebilus. And to whole Thracian Embassadors were given by way of presents, 1000 asses apiece. So Roxus with the rest of the hostages was sent for from Caracoli, and with the fore-named Embassadors returned again to his father.

The

As the Kings ships taken from the Macedonians, of an extraordinary and illustrious bignes before time, were landed upon Mars field and there laid up. While the remembrance of the Macedonian triumph remained still not in the minds only, but as it were in the very eyes of men,
L. Anicius triumphed over King Gentius and the Illyrians upon the very day of the feast Quirinalis.
 It was generally thought that all things therein rather resembled some likeness in show, than otherwise countervailed in substance the former triumph; The General himself Anicius was inferior to Emilius both in nobility and also in quality of person: and setting together their places of command, the one being but Pretor, and the other Consul; neither was Gentius equal to Per- seus, nor the Illyrians to the Macedonians. Spoil for spoil, money for money, gifts for gifts there was no proportion nor comparison between them. And therefore as that late triumph was more resplendent and glorious than this, so considered in it self without other respect, it was not to be found fault withal and despised. Anicius within few daies had vanquished and thoroughly tamed the nation of the Illyrians: both by Sea and Land proud and mighty, bearing themselves stout and bold for their strong and fenced forts. The King he took prisoner, and those of the Kings race and royal blood. He shewed in triumph many field-ensigns, besides other spoils and moveable goods of the King. Likewise of gold seven and twenty pound weight, and of silver nineteen; besides 3000 Denarii, and a hundred and twenty thousand peeces of Illyrian silver in coin. Before his chariot were led King Gentius with his wife and children; Carvilius also the Kings brother, and certain noblemen of Illyria. Out of the pillage he gave unto his footmen 45 Denarii apiece, to every Centurion a double proportion, and unto the hotsmen a triple. To the allies of the Lig- urians nation he allowed as much as to citizens; the sailors and mariners he made equal with the footmen. Herein he surmounted the triumph of Emilius, for that his souldiers followed after his triumphant chariot more jocund and merry, and the General was praised and extolled in many a ditty and ballad. Anicius writeth, That of his booty there was raised as much money as came to twenty millions of Sesterlii, over and above the gold and silver that went into the common treasury. But because I could not see how possibly such a sum should be made, I have set down mine author for the thing, now, chuse you whether you will believe him, King Gentius with his wife, children, and brother, was by order from the Senat to Spolegium, there to be kept in ward: all the captives besides were at Rome cast into prison, and there lay. But when the Spole- tins refused to take the charge and custody of him and the rest, these Princes were translated from thence to Igiturium. There remained besides of the Illyrian prizes two hundred and twenty barks, which being taken from King Gentius, Q. Cassius by the ordinance of the Senat gave and distributed among the citizens of Corphy, Apollonia, and Dyrhachium.

The Consuls that year after they had only wasted the territories of the Ligurians, because they could never train the enemies forth to fight, having done no memorable service, returned to Rome for the choice of new Magistrats in the room of the old. And so the first comitial or court day that came, they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Scribonius Curio. The morrow after were elected for Pretors L. Livius, L. Apuleius Saturninus, A. Licinius Nerva, P. Rutilius Calvus, P. Quintilius Varus, and Marcus Furius. These Pretors had their government in this manner:
 two for the jurisdiction within the City, two for Spain, the other for Sicily and Sardinia. This year leapt, and the leap day was the morrow after the feast Terminalis. That year died O. Clau- dus the Augur, and in his place the college of the Augurs chose T. Quinctius Flaminius. Also M.
Fabius Pretor the Flamin of Quirinus the same year departed this life. This year also came King Perseus to Rome with his son Nicomedes. He entered into the City with a great train attending upon him; from the gate he went directly to the common place and the tribunal of Q. Cassius the Pretor. And when there was a great concourse of people about him from all parts; he said that his coming was to worship the Gods which are the presidents of the City of Rome; as also to sal-late the people of Rome, and withal to shew his own joy and to wish theirs for their happy victory over the two Kings Perseus and Gentius, and for that by subduing the Macedonians and Illy- rians, they had enlarged their hegemony and dominion. And when the Pretor made an offer to call Perseus for him even that present day, if he would so himself he desired two daies respite to see the Temples of the Gods, to view the City, and to visit his good friends and acquaintance. L. Corneli- us Scipio the treasurer was appointed to go about with him and shew him all: who also had been sent as far as to Capua for to meet him upon the way: also for him and his train about him, there was a sufficient house taken up, where he was kindly and liberally intreated. The third day after he came into the Senat, where after he had congratulated in their behalf for their late victory, he recounted his own demerits and good deserts during the war; and then requested, that he might have leave to pay his vows and namely, to sacrifice at Rome in the capitol, ten head of greater beasts, and one at Preneste to Fortuna. For that he said those vows were made for the victory of the people of Rome. Also that the league and alliance with him might be renewed: from that the Gaul won by conquest from King Antiochus, which being not by the people of Rome given unto any, the Gaul notwithstanding held in possession, might be conveyed unto him by a deed of gift.
 Last of all he recommended his son Nicomedes to the Senat. He found much favor among all them who had been Generals of armies in Macedonia. And therefore he obtained directly all other suits that he made: only as touching the said lands, this answer he had, That they would send certain commissioners to see and view the thing. And if it appeared and fell out, that the foresaid land appertained to the people of Rome, and was not passed away by gift to any already, they would repete

"separate King Prospere the worthiest man of all others, to receive that donation at his hands. But if it never belonged to King Antiochus, and so manifest and evident that the people of Rome had no right unto it, or if the Greeks had a grant thereof already, Prospere then must be content and pardon them, if they were unwilling to grant him with his people's prejudicial and injurious to another. Neither could a thing never so freely given, be an acceptable gift, which he knew the donor may take away from the donee at his pleasure. As for Antiochus himself, they would willingly receive him into their protection and his hands for so recommended. And how careful and tender the people of Rome was over those children committed unto them to keep, may appear by Prodomas the King of Egypt. With his sister was Antiochus dismissed. Orders were given that he should be presented with a certain sum of silver recompensed with silver plate of the quantity of 50 pound weight. Also they ordained that Antiochus should have gifts proportionable to that sum which was given Masgabath the son of Antiochus for all that he and all other things appertaining to sacrifices, should be allowed unto the King out of the King's chamber, like as to the magistrates of Rome, chose whether he would stay and govern them at Antiochus. Also that out of that fleet which rid in the harbor of Antiochus, there should be twenty galleys assigned him to use, until such time as the King were obliged at the fleet which was given him. Finally, that L. Cornilius Scipio should accompany him and never depart from him, but bear the charges both of him and his retinue about him until they were embarked and on shipboard; it is said, that the King rejoiced wonderfully at this courtesy and kindness shown him by the people of Rome, and that he would needs pay for those presents which were given him, only he comprehended his son to take a gift at the hands of the people of Rome. Thus much have our historians written as touching K. Prosperi. But Polyhistor reports that this King was unworthy the Majesty of so honorable a name, for that he was wont to mock the Embassadors of Rome with his head shaven and a cap upon it, so to acknowledge and call himself the freed villain and a slave of the people of Rome, and in jests so much he wore the badge and token of that degraded condition. As Rome likewise when he entered the Council-house, he stooped down and kissed the very door-ill, calling the Senators Gods, his Saviors, yea, and to have used other speeches not so honorable to the hearers, as befitting his own person. When he had sojourned in and about the City not above thirty daies, he took his leave and departed into his own Realm.

To the Reader.

From the five and fortieth book forward, all the rest of Livy (to the great main and blemish of the Latine tongue, and no small grief of learned men) is lost, even 100 books wanting five, like as those ten between the tenth and one and twentieth books, commonly called the second Decad. For as it appeareth by L. Florus the Epitomist there were in all 140: and the arguments of so many remain at this day, by him collected. But as it is true that Francis Petrarch saith Livy wrote in all 142: and as Charles Sigonius probably conjectureth, the 36 and 37 Breviaries of L. Florus be remainings of this last number. How all these complete books of T. Livius should miscarry, is a matter certainly known. Some hope there is that they are but mislaid, and laid out of the way. For like as within these hundred years some fragments of the story were discovered in Mogunce: and the last five books now extant, found by Simon Grineus in the Library of a monastery over against the City of Worms, and dedicated by Erasmus of Rotterdam unto Charles the son of William Lord Montjoy, in the reign of Henry the eighth of famous memory King of England, &c. so we are not to despair of the rest. In the mean times, we must make such of these brief summaries left unto us. Even as therefore I have inserted those ten Breviaries in stead of the books: so I thought it not amiss (in hope that one day the very books themselves will come to light) to proceed in the rest following: and the rather for that neither he that translated Livy into the Tuscan language, nor they who have done him into French (as far as I could ever see) have taken that pains.

Eumenes came towards Rome. Now because in the Macedonian war he had carried himself in different between Perseus and the Romans, there passed a law in general terms, That no King might repair to Rome; so the end, that if he were excluded, he should not be repaid an enemy; nor if he were admitted, acquit and cleared of all fault. Cl. Marcellus the Consul subdued the Gauls inhabiting the Alps; and C. Sulpitius Gallus the Ligurians. The Embassadors of King Prusias complained of Eumenes, for that he invaded and wasted their borders; and they informed besides, that he had conspired with Antiochus against the people of Rome. At the earnest suit and entreaty of the Rhodians, a league was contracted with them. The Censors took a review and survey of the City, wherein were enrolled and taxed 327022 citizens of Rome. M. Aemilius Lepidus was elected president of the Senat. Ptolemæus the King of the Egyptians, was by his younger brother expelled out of his realm; but by the means of Embassadors (sent from Rome) he was restored to his Kingdom. Upon the death of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, his son Ariarathes came to the crown, and by entercourse and mediation of Embassadors, renewed amity with the people of Rome. This book containeth besides, the wars against the Ligurians, Corsians, and Lusitanians, fought with variable fortune; the trouble also in Syria after the death of Antiochus, who left behind him Antiochus his son, a very child. The young Prince (together with his guardian Iyas) Demetrius the son of Seleucus (who had been sent in hostage to Rome) murdered privily, because he was not set at large and dismissed by the Romans; and so himself entered upon the Kingdom. L. Aemilius Paulus who had conquered Perseus, departed this life; whose incorruption and abstinence from the publick treasure was such, that notwithstanding he had brought both out of Spain and Macedony so great store of wealth and riches, yet when his goods were prized and sold, there would be hardly raised thereof sufficient to repay his wife her dowry. The Pompeian marishes were drawn drie by Cor. Cethegus the Consul (unto whom that charge was by lot given) and the same turned into firm ground.

Of the XLVII. Book.

Cneus Tremellius, a Tribune of the Commons had a fine set on his head, for that he had contended in a wrongful cause with M. Aemilius Lepidus the sovereign Pontife. The power and authority of the clergy Magistrates, was greater and mightier than before. A law was enacted as touching inordinable suit for offices. In the survey of the City, there were taxed in the subsidy book 328314 Roman citizens. L. Aemilius Lepidus was chosen again president of the Senat. Between the two brethren Ptolemæes, who were at variance, there passed this accord and agreement, That the one should reign in Egypt and the other in Cyrenæ. Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, by the politick plot and forcible power of Demetrius King of Syria dispossessed of his Kingdom, was by the Senat set into it again. Certain Embassadors were sent as delegates from the Senat to determine of the litigious ground between Masaniſſa and the Carthaginians. C. Marius the Consul fought against the Dalmatians, at the first unfortunately, but afterwards achieved the victory. The occasion of the war with them was this; for that they had made wast upon the Illyrians, who were allies of the people of Rome. The same nation Cornelius Nasica the Consul brought in subjection. Q. Opimius the Consul subdued the Ligurians beyond the Alps, who had spoiled Antipolis and Nicæa, two Towns belonging to the seignory of the Massilians. Moreover there are contained the adventures of many Captains in Spain, with no good success. In the 598 year from the foundation of the City, the Consuls so soon as the assembly for election was past, and other Consuls chosen for the year following, began their office. The cause of this alteration was, because the Spaniards were entered into rebellion. The Embassadors aforesaid who had been sent to take up and decide the controversy between Masaniſſa and the Carthaginians, made report, That they had found great store of ship-timber and other matters for a navy at Carthage. Certain Pretors accused by the provinces for avarice, were condemned.

Of the XLVIII. Book.

The Censors took a review and tax of the city, wherein were reckoned three hundred four and twenty thousand polls of citizens. The causes of a third Punic war be here record'd. Upon a report that there was a right puissant army of Numidians upon the borders of the Carthaginians, conducted by Artabazanes the nephew of Syphax, M. Porcius Cato perswaded in an oration to proclaim war against the Carthaginians, for that they intertained such a power within their frontiers under a colour against Masaniſſa, the enemy raised against the Romans: howbeit Publius Cornelius Nasica gain said him and dissuaded the matter. Whereupon ordained it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage in official so observe what they did, and whereabout they went. Who after they had given the Carthaginians

Senat a check and rebuke, for that against the covenants of the league, they maintained forces, and were provided of timber and other stuff for a navy, they were unwilling to countenance such a project. Masaniissa and them: so as Masaniissa should forge and part with the land in question. But Gisco the son of Amilcar, a bold and seditious man; who then was sovereign Magistrate (and withstanding their Senate promised to be ruled by the award of the said Embassadors) incited them so by his persuasive remonstrances to war upon the Romans, that the Embassadors made shift to flee and save themselves, or else they had come to a mischief. When they related these news at Rome, the Senat already set and bent against the Carthaginians, were now by his words provoked much more. M. Porcius Cato performed the funerals of his son, deceased in his Pretorship, with exceeding small charges, according to his ability; for he was not poor. One Andronicus, who stoutly made the world believe, that he was the son of Perseus the King of Macedony, was sent to Rome. M. Emilius Lepidus, nine six times chosen President of the Senat by the Censors, gave his son in straight charge before he died, to carry him forth to be buried in a couch without linnen clothes and a purple pall, and not to bestow in other obsequies above one denier: saying, that the funerals of the greatest and best personages are wont to be ennobled and honoured with the show of images and titles, and not with sumptuous expenses. An inquisition there was about the practise of poisoning and forgery. Publilia and Licinia, who were endited for making away their husbands, put in sureties before the Pretor, to be bound in goods, lands, and body for them, and after judicial process passed, and their cause heard, by a decree of their kinsfolk suffered death. Gulusa the son of Masaniissa gave intelligence, that at Carthage there was mustering and levying of soldiers, rigging and providing of a fleet, all preparations no doubt for war: and Publius Cornelius Nasica replied against, that no thing was to be done inconsiderately, without advise. Thought good it was to send ten Embassadors, for to see the truth of all, and upon their knowledge to certify. L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Posthumus Albinus the Consuls, when they took musters with severity and rigour, and would not for favour spare any one, but press all, were commended by the Tribuns of the commons, who for their friends could obtain at their hands no release and immunity of souldiery. By occasion of the wars in Spain, which many times had been untowardly and unfortunately managed, when the City of Rome was so dismayed and daunted that there could not be found any one who would so much as accept of a martial Tribuneship, or was willing to go in quality of Lieutenant: P. Cornelius Emilianus stepped forth, made offer and professed, that he would undertake any kind of military service whatsoever should be laid upon him: and by his own example stirred up all the rest to the love of warfare. L. Lucullus the Consul, when Claudius Marcellus (after whom he succeeded) was thought to have quieted all the states and nations of Celtiberia, subdued the Vacceans, Cantabrians, and other regions and nations as yet unknown in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Emilianus, the son of L. Paulus, and the nephew of Africanus by adoption, being there a martial Colonel, slew a Barbarian challenger that defied him. But in the winning of the City Interetia, he adventured a more dangerous enterprise: For he was the first of all other that scaled and mounted over the wall. Servius Sulpicius Galba the Pretor shed but badly in a battle against the Portugals. When the Embassadors were returned out of Africk, together with the Carthaginian Orators, and Gulusa the son of Masaniissa, bringing word, That they found at Carthage both an army and also an armada: thought good it was, to put to question and debate the matter in the Senat: where Cato and other principal Senators were of opinion and gave advice, to transport an army presently into Africk: but because C. Nasica opined and said, That he saw as yet no just and sufficient cause of war, agreed it was to forbear all hostility and force of arms, in case the Carthaginians would burn their navy and discharge their army: if not, then agreed it was, that the Consuls next following in place of government should propose as touching the Punick war. When the Theatre was built, which by the Censors had been put forth to no known to frame, and set up at a price, through the means of Pub. Cornelius Nasica, who inferred, that it was a piece of work unprofitable, yea, and hurtful to the manners generally of the citizens: by vertue of an act of Senat demolished it was and pulled down: so as the people for a long time stood on their feet to behold the publick plaies. The Carthaginians at that time took arms contrary to the league, and warred upon Masaniissa. But vanquished they were in field by him (who notwithstanding he now was fourscore year old and twelve, yet he used to eat his meat simply without any dainty sauce, yea, and to chew his bare bread still) and over and besides they deserved to draw upon their head the Roman war.

Of the XLIX. Book.

The beginning of the third Punick war, in the six hundredth and one year from the Cities foundation, which within 5 years after it began, came to a full and finall end. Much diversity there was in opinion between M. Porcius Cato whom they reputed for the wisest, and Scipio Nasica, who by the Senat was judged the best and honestest man in the City. Cato was altogether for the wars, and advised to destroy Carthage quite: Nasica contrariwise dissuaded what he could. Nevertheless, in the end ordained it was. That because against covenant and accord they kept a navy at sea, and had led forth an army out of their borders: also for that they entered into arms and levied war upon Masaniissa, a friend and confederat to the people of Rome, and received not into their Town, Gulusa his son, who was in the company of the Roman Embassadors: war should be proclaimed against them. But before that any forces were embarked and had taken the sea, the Embassadors of Utica repaired to Rome, resending themselves and all that they had. That embassy, as a special presage to the issue and event of the war, was acceptable and pleasing to the Lords of the Senat, but heavy and grievous to the Carthaginians. In Terentium [a place it was in Campus Martius, whereupon the pastimes Terentins took their name] were plaies exhibited exhibited to Father Dis the infernal God, according to the direction of the books of Sibylla. These had been set out one hundred years before in the first Punic war, and in the five hundredth year and one, after the City was founded. Thirty Embassadors came to Rome, by whom the Carthaginians presented their submission. But the sentence of Cato imported and prevailed, to hold still their former determination, and that the Consuls with all speed should set forward in their journey to the war. Who having passed the sea and arrived in Africa, received of them three hundred hostages, whom they had required and demanded; and also took into their hands all their armor and weapons, and what furniture of war soever they found at Carthage. They proceeded moreover after all this to command them by warrant and authority from the L.L. of the Senat to build them a new Town for to inhabit in some other place, so that it were ten miles at least remote from the Sea: by which indignity offered, they provoked the Carthaginians to rise and take arms again. L. Martins and M. Manilius the Consuls, began to besiege and assault Carthage: during which siege and assault, it fortuned that two Colonels unadvisedly adventured to break into the City with their cohorts, as one part thereof where the walls were neglected, and when by the Townsmen they were sore beaten and killed, by the means of Scipio Africanus they were rescued: by whom also a certain sence and sort of the Romans, which the enemies by night assailed, with the help of a few horsemen was delivered. Moreover, he saved the camp, against which the Carthaginians sallied forth of their City to give the assaults at once upon it with all their forces: by which service he above the rest won great honor. Over and besides, when as the Consul (for the other was gone to Rome to hold the election of Magistrats) seeing the siege and assaults of Carthage took no better effect, minded to lead the army against Adrubal, who with another power of men kept the narrow streights of a certain passage, he counselled the said Cons. first, not to give battel in a place of such disadvantage: but afterwards overweighed and born down by the opinions of the greater number (who envied as well his wisdom as virtue) he also entered into the same streights. And when the Roman army, according as he foretold, was discomfited and put to flight, and two cohorts beset round and invested by the enemies, he with certain small cornets of horse returned into those streights, rescued them, and brought them away in safety. Which valour of his, even Cato, (a man otherwise more ready of his tongue to find faults) so recommended in the Senato, that in these terms he gave out, and said, "That all the best who were employed in the wars of Africa, served as shadows and dead men, but Cato had true honour and spirit indeed. The people of Rome besides cast such a favour and good liking to him, that at the next election, most of the tribes pricked him for to be Consul, notwithstanding he was by law under age. When L. Scribonius a Tribune of the Commons had promulged a law, That all the Portugals (who according to covenant and composition, yielded to the people of Rome, and yet by S. Galba were sold in France) should be restored to their freedom: M. Cato most earnestly pleaded in the behalf of that law, and maintained it. His Oration is extant to be seen, included within his Annals. Q. Fulvius Nobilior, albeit he was by him shaken up and well checked in the Senat, answered in the behalf of Galba. Then, and Galba also, seeing himself at the point to be condemned, took in his arms and embraced his own two sons: being * Prætextati, and a son of C. Sulpicius whose Guardian he was, and made such piteous and risal move, all the while he spake in his own cause, that the fore said law was revoked and cancelled. Three Orations of his there are to be seen: two against Libo a Tribune of the Commons and his proposed laws, as touching the Portugals; and one against L. Cornelius Cethegus, in which he confesseth and avoweth the killing of the Portugals, encamped near unto him: for that he knew certainly that they after their manner had sacrificed an horse and a man, and under a colour of peace, intended to set upon and charge his army. Andronicus one of base birth and the most abject lowest condition, who made the world believe that he was King Perseus his son, and thereupon changed his name and was called Philip, having made an escape and fled secretly from Rome (whither Demetrius King of Syria had sent him in regard of this his notorious lie) had many men come flocking unto him, embracing a forged and counterfeit fable of his, as if it had been a true fume and report: by which means he gathered an army together, and either with the good will of the inhabitants, or by force of arms, seized all Macedony and held it in his hands. Now had he devised and framed this pageant in this wise, That Perseus the King had begotten him (forsooth) of a concubine: that he was committed to one Cythela to be fostered and brought up: to the end that if ought should fall out but well unto the K. in that war which he waged with the Romans, there might be yet some seed as it were and issue remaining of the Kings blood and royal race. When Perseus was deceased, he had his education at Adramyttium until he was 12 years old, supposing him to be his natural father who fostered and kept him, and wist not at all from what stock he was descended. Now it fell out (saith he) that the said foster father of mine lay very sick; and being at the point of death, bewailed at length my birth and parentage. Moreover, that there was a little book given to my supposed mother, sealed with the sign manual of King Perseus which she was to deliver unto me when I came once to ripe age, and to be 14 years old: charging her most streightly of all loves, to conceal the whole matter until that time were come: and when I was grown to that age aforesaid, then the book was given me, wherein mention was made of two chests of treasure left for me by my father. Then the woman, who knew full well that I was no child of hers, but only so reputed, bewailed my birth unto me, who was aforesaid ignorant of of mine own descent: also the woman laid great wait upon me to depart out of those quarters before that Eumenes, a professed enemy to Perseus, came to the knowledge thereof, for fear to be murdered. In which respect I being affrighted and hoping withal to find some aid at the hands of Demetrius, went into Syria: and there first I took heart unto me, and dared openly to profess who I was, and never before. [Thus much of Andronicus this counterfeit Kings son.]

Theffaly at what time as the for said counterfet Philip would have invaded and kept it by force of arms, was by the means of the Roman Embassadors, together with the aid of the Achæans defended. Prusias King of Bithynia, a favourer of the basest persons and lowdest vices, was by his own son Nicomedes murdered with the help of Attalus King of Pergamus. Another son he had, who in stead of the upper row and course of distinct teeth, is reported to have had one entire bone for all, growing out at his gums. When the Romans had sent their Embassadors to conclude a peace between Nicomedes and Prusias; of which Embassadors, the one had his head full of many scars, the other was troubled with the gout in the feet, and the third reputed but blockish of spirit by nature, and none of the wisest: Cato said, That there was an embassage head-lesse, foot-lesse, and heart-lesse. In Syria, which at that time had for their King, one indeed of the line and race of Perseus K. of Macedony, but another Prusias up and down, for cowardise, idleness, and base mind; it so fell out, that while he haunted taverns, stews, and brothel-houses, and lay there altogether, Ammonius swaid the Scepter and raigned as King: by whose practise the Kings friends, also Laodice the Queen, and Antigonus the son of Demetrius came to their end and were killed. Masanissa King of Numidia, a man above four score and ten years old, a famous Prince and every way excellent, yielded to nature and died. Among other youthful parts which he performed to his dying day, this is one, That in this old age of his he was so lusty, that after the four score and sixth year of his life he got a boy. Among his three sons, Mycipsia (the eldest) Gulusia and Manastabal, who also had knowledge in the Greek tongue, Publius Scipio Æmilianus divided the administration of the Kingdom: for their father had left it in common for them all, and had given order to part it at the discretion of the same Scipio. Likewise, he perswaded Phamias the commander under Himilco of the Carthaginian Cavalry, (a valiant warrior, and whom the Carthaginians employed most of all others in service) to revolt with his men of arms and to turn Roman. Of those three Embassadors above said who were sent to Masanissa, Claudius Marcellus was cast away in a tempest upon the sea, and swallowed up of the waves in a gulf. The Carthaginians murdered in their Council-chamber Aldrubal nephew of Masanissa, and their Pretor for the time being, upon suspicion of treason. This jealousy of theirs arose hereupon, for that he was near in kindred and blood to Gulusia, who friended and succoured the Romans. Publius Scipio Æmilianus, when he sued to be Edile, was by the people propounded and nominated for Consul: and when as by law he might not for his young years be created Consul, hard hold there was about him: whilest he common laboured with might and main for him, and the nobles and Lords of the Senat gain-said it a good while: but in fine, he was dispensed with, notwithstanding the law in that behalf, and created Consul. Marcus Manilius (Pro-consul) forced certain Cities situate about Carthage. Counterfet Philip, after he had slain M. Juventius the Pretor and Q. Cælius, and together with them defeated the army, was in Macedony vanquished himself and taken prisoner, and so Macedony was recovered again which had been lost before.

Of the L I. Book.

Carthage, which took up in circuit the compass of four and twenty miles, was with exceeding pain and travail besieged and won by piece-meal: first, under the conduct of Mancinus the Lieutenant; afterwards of Scipio the Consul, unto whom without lot the province of Africk was extraordinarily granted. The Carthaginians having made a new peer, (for that the old haven was choked and stopped up by Scipio) and gathered secretly in a small time a good fleet, fought a battail at Sea unfortunately. Moreover, the camp of Aldrubal their General, pitched in a place of most difficult access near the Town Nephertis, was forced, and his army defeated by Scipio: who also in the end won the very City of Carthage, in the seven hundred year after it was first founded. The greatest part of the spoil and pillage there found, was restored to the Sicilians, from whom it had been taken. In the utmost extremity and final destruction of that City, when Aldrubal had yielded and submitted to Scipio: his wife (who some daies before could not obtain at her husbands hands to abandon the Town and flie to the conqueror) cast her self with her two children headlong from the Castle into the mids of the flaming fire, where with the City burned. Scipio, following the example of his father Æmilius Paulus who had conquered Macedony, set forth certain solemn plaies and pastimes: wherein the renegats and fugitives he presented and objected to savage beasts. The causes of the Achæan war be here reported. The Roman Embassadors who had been beaten and ill intreated by the Achæans, were sent unto Corinth, to sever and disjoin those cities (which had been under the seignory of Philip) from the general diet and parliament of the Achæans.

Of the L II. Book.

Quintus Cæcilius Metellus fought a battail at Thermopylæ with the Achæans, that had to aid them the Eriotians and Chalcidians: who being overcome, Critolaus their chief Captain shortened his own life by poison: and in his place * Drachus the first author of the troubles in Achæa, was by the Achæans chosen General of the field, and by L. Mummius the Consul vanquished near to Ithmus: who having received all Achæa by surrender, rased and destroyed wretchedly Corinth, by an Act and commission directed out of the Senat; because the Roman Embassadors were there abused. Thebes also and Chalcis which had aided the Achæans, were overthrow and pulled down. Mummius for his own part, bare himself himself most abstinent and uncorrupt: for of all that wealth, and those goods and ornaments wherewith Corinth was mightily enriched, there came not one parcel into his house. Quintus Cæcilius Metellus triumphed for the conquest of Andrus, and Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus Æmilianus likewise over Carthage and Adornbal. Viriatus in Spain, first of an herdsman became an hunter, and of a hunter proved to be a very thief and robber: and within a while after, was chosen General of a complete and main army, and seized to his own use all Portugal. He took prisoner M. Virgilius the Pretor, when he had first discomfited his host in the field. After whom C. Plautius the Pretor sped no better in fight. This enemy so terrified the Romans, that to make head against him they found it necessary to employ a full consular army, and a Consul Commander. Moreover, in this book be recorded the trouble of Syria and the wars between the Kings. Alexander an obscure person and base born, having slain (as is before said) Demetrius the King, reigned in Syria. His Demetrius (the son of Demetrius) flew by the help of Ptolemaeus King of Egypt, whose daughter Cleopatra he had espoused and married. This Demetrius in times past had been sent out of the way into Gnidos by his father, fearing the doubtful chances of the war: and he entered upon this action by reason of the contemptible sort and cowardise of the said Alexander. Ptolemaeus was grievously wounded in the head: and in the cure, whiles the Chirurgians went about to trypanize the bones of his skull, died under their hand. And in his stead Ptolemaeus his younger brother who reigned in Cyrene, succeeded and took upon him the crown. Demetrius for his cruelty which he exercised upon his people by racking and other torments, was vanquished in battail by Diodorus, one of his own subjects: who made claim to the Kingdom in the right and title of Alexanders son, a young child hardly two years old: whereupon he fled to Seleucia. Lucius Mummius triumphed over the Acheans, in which solemnity he carried in pompous show sundry images as well of brass as marble, besides pictures and painted Tables.

Of the LIII. Book.

Publius Claudius the Consul subdued the Salustians, an nation inhabiting the Alps. A second Philip there was in Macedony, who by L. Tremellius the treasurer was with his army defeated and slain. Q. Cæcilius Metellus the Proconsul gave the Celtiberians an overthrow. The most part of Portugal was regained by Q. Fabius the Proconsul, and many Cities thereof by assault forced. C. Julius a Senator by calling, wrote the Roman History in the Greek tongue.

Of the LIV. Book.

Quintus Pompeius the Consul subdued the Tarracini in Spain: with whom verily as also with the Numantines by occasion of his infirmity and sickness, he concluded peace. A review and numbering of the citizens was taken by the Consuls: wherein were enrolled four hundred twenty eight thousand three hundred forty two polls. At what time as the Macedonian Embassadors came to complain of D. Junius Syllanus, the Lord Deputy over them, for that he took their money, and nevertheless made an havoc of the Province, and thereupon the Senat was willing to have the hearing of their complaint: T. Manlius Torquatus the father of Syllanus, exhibited a request, and obtained, that the inquiry and decision of such a matter as this might be referred over and committed unto him. And after he had sitten upon this commission at home in his mansion, and found his son guilty, he both condemned him and put him to death: when afterwards he had hanged himself, for that was his end, he would not be so much as to see at his funeral, but according to his ordinary manner and customs, sat in his house, attending all clients, and commending him for counsel. Q. Fabius the Proconsul, after he had managed the war in Spain rather prosperously, married all with this foul blot and spot of dishonor, in that he contracted a peace with Viriatus upon even and equal conditions. Thus Viriatus by a practise contrived by Servilius Cæpio, was treacherously murdered by traitors, and of his own army was much bewailed. At his death he was rung out of this world with a notable peal of farewell, and right honorably entred: an excellent man, and most brave Captain for the space of thirteen years, during which time he warred with the Romans, and ever for the most part went away with the winning hand.

Of the LV. Book.

When P. Cornelius Nafica, who by way of mockery was surnamed Serapio, by scoffing Curatius a Tribune of the Commons, and D. Junius Brutus the Consul took the musters, there hapned in the very sight of the arm and a soldier an occurrence of great consequence, and for example sake exceeding profitable. For C. Marius was judicially accused before the Tribunes of the Commons, for that he had abandoned and forsaken his own army in Spain, whereupon he being convicted was condemned and branded along while with rods, carrying a forked cross upon his shoulders, and in the end sold as a slave for a small piece of silver of three half pence fetching cue. The Tribunes of the Commons, because they might be allowed to exempt from with any servile condition soldiers a piece, whom it pleased them to choose, commanded the Consul to prison. Inn. Brutus the Consul, while he was in Spain, engaged those soldiers who had served under Viriatus with land and living, and gave them a Town to inhabit called Valentia. M. Popilius, together with his army was foiled and put to the rout by the Numantines, with whom the peace that was concluded, the Senat had passed an act that it should not stand in force. The occasion was this:

this: As C. Mancinus the Consul was devoutly sacrificing the sacred chickens cranted to the army out of their cage or coop. Afterwards, as he was about to take Sea and go a shipboard for to pass over into Spain, there hapned a voice to be heard, saying, Stay, Stay Mancinus. These proved in the effect to be unfortunat and heavy presages unto Mancinus, for he received an overthrow at the Numantian battle, and was turned clean out of his camp. And seeing no hope esse to save his army, he entered into a dishonorable peace with them, but the Senate expressly revoked and annulled the same. 30000 Romans were defeated by 4000 Numantians & no more. D. Iulius made a general conquest of all Portugal, even as far as to the Ocean, by forcing and sackings their Cities and strong Towns: and when his soldiers were like to pass over the river *Oblivio, he caught up a banner from the port-enemy, and carried it over with him, and by this means perswaded them to go through. Alexander's son, King of Syria, a child not above ten years old at the most, was treacherously murdered by Diodorus his guardian or protector, furnished Tryphon. There were Physicians by corruption bribed and suborned to give it out and bear the people in hand most falsly, that the young Prince pined away with the pain of the stone in the bladder, and whilst they would seem to cut him for it, they killed him out of hand in the very section.

Of the LVI. Book.

Decius Iunius Brutus had good fortune in the farther Provinces of Spain, fighting with the Gallians. But M. Aemilius Lepidus, Pro-consul, fell for a heroism in his wars against the Vaccei, and suffered the like overthrow to that other received from the Numantians. When Mancinus the author and maker of the accord with the Numantians, was delivered up in person to the Numantians, for to assill the people of Rome, and discharge them in conscience for cancelling the said covenant, they received him not, and would none of him. The people was numbred and taxed by the Censors, in which survey and account taken, there were entred into their books 323000 Roman citizens. Fulvius Flaccus the Cos. brought the Vardeans in Illyricum under subjection. M. Cosconius the Pretor fought in Thracia with the Scordiscians, and won the better. When by the default and error of the Captains and Commanders, the Numantin war continued still, not without the publick shame and dishonor of the state: the Senate and people of Rome conferred the Consulship upon Scipio Africanus, without any suit or seeking of his part. And when he was unwilling to accept thereof, by reason of a law forbidding expressly, *that any man should be created Cos. the second time, he had a dispensation, and was freed from the law in that behalf, like as from the *other in his former Consulship. There was an insurrection of bondslaves arose in Sicily: and when it could not be suppressed by the Pretors and Lord Governors, C. Fulvius had the charge of that Province and service. This war began by occasion of one Eunus a bondslave and a Syrian born: who having assembled together a power of rustical peasants and country slaves broken prison and houses of correction, came to have a full and complete army. Moreover, Cleon also another notable slave, raised up the number of 70000 villains like himself: and they both joining their forces together waged war many times against the people of Rome and their army in those parts.

* The text is here corrupt, for there were 32 years between this time and his former Consulship, & therefore it is not meant, de lege Decennali, but of another law lately made, ne quis iterum Consul fieret, and according to the place corrected by Sigonius I have translated it.

Of the LVII. Book.

Scipio Africanus laid siege to Numantia: and whereas the army was grown to be corrupted through dissolute riot and loose life, he reclaimed the same, and reduced it unto a most streight and severe kind of military discipline. For he cut off all the means and occasions of delishsome pleasures: he sent packing away two thousand whores and trulls that followed the camp: he held the soldiers hard to work every day: he forced each one to carry on his shoulders corn for thirty dayes and seven good stakes besides for a pallasado. If he spied one of them to go heavily under his load, he would say thus under him, Sirra, while you have the skill to empale your self with your sword's point, then cease to carry palls: but not before. When he saw another practise to wield very nimbly a little light buckler, he commanded him to bear a target of a bigger size and weightier than ordinary, as finding fault that he knew better how to hold his shield for defence of his own body, than to handle his sword for offence of the enemy. Next he with a soldier out of his rank and file? If he were a Roman, up he went and war well beat and swailed with vine-wine by the centurion: if a stranger, swunged and jerked he was with [birchen]* rods by the Leaders. And verily, all the pack-horses and other labouring beasts he caused to be sold: because they should not ease the soldiers of their carriage. Well, many a time he bare himself worthily in fight, and had a fortunate hand against the enemies that sallied forth against him. The Vacceans were streightly besoyed: and when they had killed their wives and children, they flew their own selves upon them. Scipio, at what time as Antiochus King of Syria had sent unto him most rich and stately presents: whereas other Generals of the field were wont to conceal the gifts of KK. he avowed the accepting of them in open sight of all men, even at the very Tribunal seat. And when he had so done, he commanded his treasurer to receive all, and enter in his book of receipts for the state: promising out of that stock to reward the hardiest men and most valiant knights. When he had blocked and invested Numantia on every side, and saw the enemies driven to great distress for hunger, he forbade expressly to kill any of them that went forth of the Town to forage and purvey victuals, saying, That the more they were in number, the sooner they would consume and spend up the corn which they had.

Of the LVIII. Book.

Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, a Tribune of the Commons, when he promulged an Agrarian law, that no man should hold and occupy above five hundred arpens or acres of the City lands, setting the Senate and orders of Gentlemen to storm against it, grew into such an heat of choler and furious rage, that presently by an old made, he deprived of Tribunitian power M. Octavius his Collegue, for maintaining the cause of the adverse part: and withal, created himself, his brother C. Gracchus, and App. Claudius his own wives father, Triumvirs or commissaries for dividing of the said lands. He proposed also and published another Agrarian law, by virtue whereof if any man encroached farther, and went above that stint and proportion, the same Triumvirs and none but they should set down and determine, how far forth the common grounds and the private lands should reach. Afterwards, when they fell out to be less ground than could be divided, he protested that without the offence of the common people (because terrible he had stirred up their appetite to hope for great matters) he would prefer a law, That amongst all them, who by virtue of the law Sempronian ought to receive lands, the money which belonged sometime to King Attalus should be divided. Now this Attalus the King of Pergamus and son of Eumenes, had left behind him, the people of Rome his full heir of all that he had. The Senate upon these so many indignities offered by Gracchus, was highly displeased, and Pub. Mucius the Consul above the rest: who after he had inveighed in the Senate against him, was by him hated forth before the people, and accused unto the Commons, howbeit he declaimed against him, once again openly from the Rostra. When Gracchus would have been chosen Tribune of the Commons a second time, by the advice and procurement of P. Cornelius Nasica, the chief peers and nobles slew him in the Capitol. He caught his first knock with the broken pieces of the Tribunes puer. And he among others slain in that sedition garb, was never committed to the earth, but thrown into the river. Moreover, this book contains the battles in Sicily, fought against the fugitive slaves with variable fortune and event.

Of the LIX. Book.

THE Numantines forced by great extremities, and of famine especially, murdered themselves in confusion by turns. After the City was won, Scipio Africanus raised and destroyed it utterly: and over it triumphed, in the fourteenth year after the ruin of Carthage. P. Attilius the Consul dispatched and ended the war in Sicily, with the foresaid fugitives. Aristonicus the son of King Eumenes, invaded Asia and held it to his own use: whereat by the last will and testament of King Attalus, it was bequeathed to a legacy unto the people of Rome, and ought to have been freed. Against him, P. Licinius Crassus the Consul and Archbishop besides (a thing never done or seen before) took a journey with an army out of Italy, and in a battle was overthrown and lost his life. M. Perperna the Consul overcame Aristonicus, and received him by surrender. Q. Pomponius and Q. Metellus were elected Censors, the first Commissioners that ever both together attained to that dignity. A review was taken by the Censors, wherein were numbered 368823 citizens, besides orphans and widows. Q. Metellus the Censor gave his advice and opinion, that all men should be compelled to take wives, for the breeding of children. His Oration to that purpose is extant, which Augustus Caesar, at what time as he went in hand to joy in marriage, all the three states and degrees of the City rehearsed in the Senate, as if it had been penned to fit these times wherein we now live. C. Attilius Laber, a Tribune of Commons, commanded Q. Metellus the Censor (who in the review and new choice of the Senators did him that disgrace as to leave him out) to be pitched the halloo from the rock Tarpeia, whither the rest of the Tribunes assisted the Censor all that ever they could, that this commandment should not be executed. When Carbo, a Tribune of the Com. proposed a bill, that it might be lawful to create the same man Trib. of the Commons so often as one would: P. Africanus dissuaded this law in a most grave and pithy Oration wherein he used these words especially, That he judged Tib. Gracchus to have been justly slain for his deserts. Gracchus on the other side maintained the law, and pleaded that it might pass. Tib. Scipio imported and prevailed in the end. In this book were related the wars between Antiochus king of Syria, and Phraates king of the Parthians: as also strivings of Egypt, which stood thus in no better terms, Ptolemeus surnamed Evergetes. for his exceeding cruelty grew hateful and odious to his own subjects: and when the people had set on fire and burned his royal palace, he fled by stealth into Cyprus: and when the kingdom was by the people made wholly over to his sister Cleopatra, whom (after he had deflowered by force her daughter, a virgin, and so taken her to wife) he had turned away in great a pleasure and malice unto her: he killed that son he had by her, in Cyprus, and sent unto the mother the head, hands and feet. Certain seditions were raised by the Triumvirs, Fulvius Flaccus, C. Gracchus, and L. Carbo, who were created for the decision of land. Against whom P. Scipio Africanus made resistance: but being in perfect health, strong and lusty, by next hour to his house as it might be day, and was found dead in his bed-chamber the next morning. His wife Sempronius was deeply suspected to have given him a cup of poison: he resposd chiefly, because she was sister to the Gracchi, between whom and Africanus there was a grudge and enmity. Howbeit, there was no question and freights enquiry made how he came to his death. When his body was next laid the Triumvirs and seditions before said, broke forth into a light and hot fire. C. Sempronius the Consul fought against the lapid. first unfortunately, but soon after he made amends for that loss received, with a victory achieved by the special valor of C. Innus Brutus, the same man who before had conquered Portugal.

Of the LXI. Book.

Aurelius the Consul subdued the Sardiens. Fulvius Placcus was the first man that vanquished in fight the Ligurians beyond the Alps, being sent to attack the Massilians against the French Salyes, who lay sore upon the borders of the Massilians; and Spurius Lucius Opimius the Pretor received under his subjection the Fregeians who had revolted, and destroyed the Town Fregeia. Here is reported a pestilence in Africk, by an exceeding multitude of locusts; killed and lying dead afterwards upon the ground. A survey was taken of the City by the Consuls, wherein were numbered 398736 inhabitants. C. Gracchus, brother of Tiberius, a Tribune of the Commons, but of the most witty eloquent, preferred certain dangerous laws: and among the rest, one touching grain, namely, that the Commons should be served in the market, at the rate of one half, and a third part of * Alfo, a Motion; another concerning division of lands the same which his brother before him had published, and a third (whereby he meant to corrupt the order of Gentlemen, which then accorded with the degree of Senators) namely, that from out of the Gentlemen, 600 should be taken into the Senat: and forasmuch as in those dayes, there were but 300 Senators, those 600 Gentlemen should be entering in with the said three hundred, that is to say, that the order of Gentlemen should be double in number to the Senators, and twice as strong. This Gracchus having continued his Tribuneship another year, by proposing still the Agrarian laws, procured, that many Colonies more should be planted in Italy, and one besides, upon the very plot of ground where Carthage lately destroyed, had stood: and there himself (chosen Triumvir therefor) erected a Colony. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits of Q. Metellus against those Baleare Islands, which the Greeks call Gymnætz, because the people go naked all the summer time. But Baleares they be named either of * stinging darts, or of Baleus the companion of Hercules, whom he left behind there, at what time, as he sailed to Geryon. Also, the troubles in Syria be here reported, wherein Cleopatra first with her husband Demetrius and his son Seleucus; taking great indignation, that when his father was by her killed, he without her warrant had taken the diadem upon him.

Of the LXI. Book.

Caius Sextius the Pro-consul, after he had conquered the nation of the Salyes, built the Colony Aquæ Sextiz, so called of his plentiful abundance of waters, by reason of springs both hot and cold, and also of his own name. C. Cominius the Pro-consul fought successfully against the * Allobroges, near the Town * Vindalium. The cause why he levied war against them was, for that they had received aid relieved by all means they could, from the King of the * Salvi when he fled unto them, and had wasted also the territories of the * Helvæti, who were the allies of the people of Rome. C. Gracchus, after he had born his Tribuneship with much sedition, and kept the Aventine Hill with a multitude of the Commons in arms, was by L. Opimius the Consul (who by virtue of an act of Senat had put the people in arms) disarmed of his hold and slain, and together with him Fulvius Placcus a Consular man, his nephew and companion in this furious outrage. Q. Fabius Maximus the Consul, and nephew of Paulus, was in field of the Allobroges, and Bituricus King of the Arveti. Of Bituricus his army were slain a hundred and twenty thousand. And when himself in person was gone to Rome to satisfy the Senate, he was committed inward in Alba, for that it seemed dangerous and hurtful, he should go forth to find him back by the way into France. Also there passed a decree, that Conganiatus his son should be apprehended and sent to Rome. The Allobroges submitted and were received. L. Opimius being accused before the body of the people by Q. Decius a Tribune of the Commons, for imprisoning certain citizens unadvisedly, was acquitted.

Of the LXII. Book.

Caius Marius the Consul vanquished the Stenii, a people dwelling upon the Alpes, Midipia King of the Numidians died, and left the Kingdom unto his three sons, Adherbal, Hyempsal, and Jugurtha his brother's son, whom he had adopted for his own child. L. Cæcilius Metellus subdued the Dalmatians. Jugurtha levied war upon Hyempsal his brother, overcame him in fight, and slew him. Adherbal his third brother, he drove out of the realm, but by the Senat of Rome restored home again. L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the Consuls, deposed 32 Senators of their place and dignity. Besides, this book containeth the troubles of the Syrian Kings.

Of the LXIII. Book.

Caius Porcius the Cos. fought with the * Scordisci in Thracia, and took the field. The Consuls took a survey of the City, in which were enrolled 394336 inhabitants. Romulus Licinus, and Marcia, three vestal virgins were convicted and condemned for incest. The manner how the their sin was committed, detected, judged, and punished, is here set down. The * Encheiræ, an hard and mighty nation, invaded Illyricum and put it to the waste: by whom Papius Carbo the Consul was feared, both he and his army. Livius Drusus the Consul, warred in Thracia upon the Scordisci, (a people descended from the Gauls) and won much honour.

Of the LXIV. Book.

Adherbal warred upon by Jugurtha, was within the City Circa besieged, and by him slain. standing the commandment of the Senate to the contrary. For which cause war was proclaimed against Jugurtha himself. Calpurnius Bestia had the commission and charge to manage this war: who made peace with Jugurtha, without warrant from the people and Senate. Jugurtha being cited and called forth under safe conduct, to approach and devour the authors of his plots and designs, for that the voice went, that he had bribed and corrupted with sums of money many of the Senate, came to Rome: where he was in trouble and jeopardy for a murder committed upon the person of a certain Prince, called Mithra, (who seeing him to be loved of the Romans, sought for his kingdom whom he slew at Rome. Being commanded to answer for his life in regard of this murder, he secretly fled, and as he departed from the City, entered (by report) these words, O corrupt City and set to sale, how soon will it perish, if it may meet with a champion. A. Posthumus, Lieutenant General, after he had likewise sought an unfortunate battell against Jugurtha, amended the matter full well by making an ignominious and dishonourable peace with him, which the Senate judged not meet to be observed and kept.

Of the LXV. Book.

Quintus Cæcilius Metellus the Cof. in two battels discomfited Jugurtha and over-ran all Numidia. M. Jun. Syllanus the Cof. sped unluckily in a battell fought against the Cimbrians: whose crosses and demands of the Senate a place of habitation and lands to occupy were denied. M. Minutius Pro-Cof. had good success in fight against the Thracians. L. Cassius the Cof. together with his best, was defeated and cut in pieces in the borders of the Allobrogians by the French Tigurini, a country of the Helvetians, who had divided themselves and were departed from the rest of the State. The soldiers remaining alive after that overthrow, capitulated with the enemies for safety of their lives, to give in pledges for to part with the one moiety of all that ever they had unto them.

Of the LXVI. Book.

Jugurtha driven out of Numidia by C. Marius, had the help and aid of Bocchus King of the Moors: but when the power of Bocchus also was defeated in battell, and himself unwilling to maintain the war any longer (so unfortunately begun) Jugurtha was overcome, and delivered up to C. Marius. In which exploit the service of L. cornelius Sylla treasurer unto Marius, was singular above the rest.

Of the LXVII. Book.

Aurelius Scaurus lieutenant to the Cof. was with his army overthrown by the Cimbrians, and himself taken prisoner. When by them he was called forth to council (at what time as they intended a voyage into Italy) in which he seemed to fright them for passing over the Alps, saying, That the Romans might not possibly be overcome; he was by Bolus their King, a proud and fierce prince, killed. At the same time his hands Cn. Manlius Cof. and Q. Serv. Cæpio, Pro-consul, received an overthrow in the field, and lost both their camps. Slain there were 80000 soldiers of porters, scullions, launders, and such followers of the camp besides 40000. By the verdict and censure of the people of Rome, Cæpio (through whose rashness this loss and overthrow hapned) was condemned; and he was the first after K. Tarquin whose goods were confiscated; and finally, deprived he was of his government. In the triumph of C. Marius, Jugurtha with his two sons was led before his chariot: and afterwards murdered in prison. Marius entered into the Senate with his triumphant mantle of estates, which never any man before him had done, and for fear of the Cimbrians war he continued in his Magistracy many years together. To his second and third Consulship he was chosen absent, and he attained to be Consul the fourth time: which he gaped for, albeit he dissembled the contrary. C. Domitius was by the suffrages of the people created the chief Pontiffe. The Cimbrians having laid waste all the parts about the river Rhodanus and the mountain Pyrenæus, passed over into Spain through the streights: where after they had spoiled many places, they were by the Celtiberians chased away: and being returned into France, they joyned with the Tectosages, a warlike nation.

Of the LXVIII.

Marcus Antonius the Prætor persecuted the rovers at sea, and chased them as far as into Cilicia. Cn. Manlius the Consul manfully defended the camp, assailed with all most forcible means by the Tectosages and Ambroses. Afterwards in two battels one after another about Aquæ Sextiæ, he utterly defeated his enemies: where (by report) were slain 100000, and 90000 taken prisoners. Marius in his absence was created Consul now the fifth time: and when a triumph was offered unto him, he deferred and put it off, until he had made a full and small conquest also of the Cimbrians. The Cimbrians repelled and drove from the Alps Q. Catulus the Pro-consul, who had beset the narrow gullet of the Alps, and kept a Castle highly mounted over the river Athesia, which he now abandoned: and when by their valour they had cleared the passage, they pursued the Pro-consul with his army, and passed over into Italy, where in battell they were overthrown by the same Catulus and C. Marius, who had joyned their forces together: In which (they say) 140000 men were slain, and 60000 taken prisoners. Marius was honourably received at his return with a generall accord of the whole City: and whereat two triumphs were offered unto him, he was content with one. The principal preys and nobles of the City, who along time before had envied him as a man newly risen, and advanced to so great honours, confessed now that the common-weal by him was preserved. Publicius Metellus for murdering his own mother, with the first man forced up in a leather bag and so thrown into the sea. Here is recorded how the sacred shield Ancilla stored of themselves with a great rustling noise before the Cimbrians war was finished. Finally this book comprehendeth the wars between the two Kings of Syria.

Of the LXX Book.

Cneus Apuleius Saturninus, by the help of C. Marius, and by occasion that S. Norinus his competitor and concurrent was by his soldiers slain, was by force of arms created Tribune of the commons, and bore the Tribuneship as violently as he got it. And when he had procured an Agrarian law and passed it by force, he arrested Metellus Numidicus to answer at a day, for that he had not followed and sworn to the said law: who being maintained and defended by the Citizens of the same sort, he left he would give no occasion of necessity debates and civil contentions, went in voluntary exile to Rhodes: and there he employed his time in reading of books, and giving audience to great and famous men. After he was departed, C. Marius the captain and author of that sedition, who now had purchased a sixth Consulship by a largesse of money scumbled among the tribes, proclaimed him a common enemy and interdicted from fire and water like an outlaw. The same Apuleius Saturninus, Tribune of the commons, then C. Memmius in his white gown standing to be Cof. for that he feared him above all other, to cross his proceedings: whereupon the Senate was exceedingly moved in the cause and behalf of C. Memmius: and when C. Marius a man by nature mutable and in his counsell variable, one who ever loved to be on the better side of the hedge and to band with the mightier, was not able to bear him out and protect him, he said Saturninus together with Glancia the Prator and other his complices in that outrage, was slain by one Rabirius. Q. Cæcilius Metellus was recalled out of banishment with exceeding great love and favour of the whole City. Manius Aquilius the Pro-cof. dispatched and ended the flaver-war raised in Sicily.

Of the LXXI. Book.

When Manius Aquilius should plead his own defence, or answer in case of extortion, he would not himself intreat and crave the favour of the jury. But M. Antonius his advocat who pleaded for him at the bar, sit his coat down along his breast, to show the honourable scars received in the forefront of his body: which being by the Judges seen, they made no doubt, but acquit him. Of this thing Cicero is the only author. Didius the Pro-cof. managed his wars against the Getiberians happily. Ptolemaeus K. of Cyrene, surnamed Apion, when he died, left the people of Rome his heir: and the Senate decreed that the cities of his realm should be free. Ariobarzanes was restored to his kingdom of Cappadocia, by L. Cornelius Sylla. The Parthian ambassadors sent from their K. Artaces came unto Sylla, to treat and sue for amity with the people of Rome. P. Rutilius a man of uncorrupt and innocent life, who (being lieutenant under L. Mucius the Pro-cof.) had defended Asia from the wrongfull dealings of the Publicans or common farmers (being odious to the order of knight-hood or gentlemen of Rome, who now as Judges had the jurisdiction in their hands) was condemned for extortion and banished. C. Geminius the Prator fought unawares against the Thracians. The Senate would no longer abide the uncurbed and wilfull abuses committed by the gentlemen in exercising of their jurisdiction, and therefore began by all means possible to endeavour for to reduce and translate their prerogative again to themselves: in which enterprise M. Livius Drusus a Tribune of the commons stood in their behalf: who to gain more strength to the cause, raised the commons by proposing unto them a pernicious hope of a largesse. Moreover in this book are comprised the stirr and troubles of the Kings in Syria.

Of the LXXI. Book.

Marcus Livius Drusus, a Tribune of the commons, for the better maintenance of the Senate's cause, which he had undertaken, solicited the allies and the nations of Italy, upon hope to be enfranchised citizens of Rome: by whose assistance having gone through by strong hand, with the Agrarian and Frumentarian laws, he obtained also the fore-said law Judicialis, in this manner. That all judgments should pass indifferently and equally by Senate and Gentlemen. After this, when the freedom of Rome promised to the allies could not be compassed and performed, the Italians in a chafe and heat of choler began to complot how to revolt: whose conventicles, conspiracies, and orations delivered in the assemblies and diets of their Princes, are in this book reported: In regard whereof, Livius Drusus became hateful even to the Senate, as the author of a social war, and in his own house was murdered, but by whom God knoweth.

Of the LXXII. Book.

The Italian states revolt, namely, the Picents, Vestins, Marsians, Pelignians, Marrucians, Lucans, and Samnites. The Picents first entered into arms and began the war. Quintus Servilius the Pro-cof. was slain in Asculum, together with all the Roman citizens which were in that town: whereupon the whole people of Rome put on arms and soldiers coats. Servius Galba being surprised by the Lucans, escaped captivity by the means of one woman, in whose house he took up his lodging. Esernia and Alba, two Colonies, were by the Italians besieged. After this, here are reported the aids of the Latines and other forraign nations sent unto the people of Rome: moreover, the expeditions and alternative winning of cities, as well by the one side as the other.

Of the LXXIII. Book.

Lucius Cæsar the Cof. in a battell against the Samnites went down and had the worse. Nola the colony fell into the hands of the Samnites, together with L. Posthumus the Prator who there was slain. Many more nations revolted to the enemies, for that P. Rutilius the Consul had fought with loss against the Marsians, and lost his life in the battell. C. Marius his lieutenant had a better conflict with the enemies in the end and upshot. Servius Sulpitius vanquished the Pelignians. Q. Cæpio, another lieutenant of Rutilius, who having been by the enemies besieged, had sallied forth upon the enemies and got the upper hand: for this good success he was made equal in government and command with C. Marius. But hereupon he grew to be too rash, and being over-taken by an ambush of the enemies was slain, and the army defeated. L. Cæsar the Consul won a field of the Samnites: for which victory the soldiers coats were laid off again at Rome. Yet because the fortune of the field would shew her self variable, the colony Eser-

Lucius Cornelius Cinna, at what time as by force and arms he published dangerous Libels thereupon by his Collegue Cn. Octavius driven out of the City with six Tribunes of the commons by sides and being thus deprived of his rule and authority, he became commander of Ap. Claudius his army by corruption: employing with C. Marius and other trusted persons, one of Africk he marched in the winter against the City of Rome. In which war, it fortuned that two brethren, the sons of Pompeius his army, and the other of Cinna, encountered in fight and here met one another. Now when the combat was in disposing and spoiling him, when he had done the few what he had done, and took knowledge that it was his brother: whereupon he fell into an exceeding passion fit of maling and lamentation: made a funeral fire for his brothers corps, flaked himself through his horsemans, and in the same fire was burnt and consumed to ashes. Now whereas these could never might have been suppressed in his beginning: such was the fraudulent dealing of Cn. Pompeius who striving to maintain both parties and strength in Cinna, and set not to his helping hand before that the Nobles side went down: such also was the faithfulness and coldness of the Consul, that Cinna and Marius took force and grew strong: and so with four armies, whereof two were committed to the conduct of Q. Sertorius, and C. Carbo, they invested the City of Rome. Marius was by force the Colony Ostia, and most cruelly ransacked it, and a great number of

The Italian cities were by the same city abolished, and obtained the freedom of Rome. The same time was only continued in arms, headed again with Cinna and Marius. By whom was Plancius Ratin and his army defeated. Cinna and Marius together with Carbo and Sertorius were possessed of Is-taurum, and having discomfited and repelled by Octavius the Consul, retired and departed. Marius pulled and laid desolate Anagninum, Ardea, and Lavinium three Colonies. When at this the nobility and Lords of the Senate had no hopes at all left to withstand the contrary factions, by reason of the weakness and weakness as well of soldiers as leaders, when upon expectation either would not fight at all, or else was over to the adverse part: Cinna and Marius were received into Rome: when as if it had been an enemy City forced by assault, made havock of it with sack and massacre. In this garb Cn. Octavius the Consul lost his life, and all the nobility of the other side were murdered: and among the rest, M. An-tonius most eloquent Orator, and C. Cælar: whose heads were set upon the Pulvis Rostre. Young Cra-sus the son was by the horsemen of Fimbria killed: and Crassus the father, because he would not endure any indignity whereby his virtue fell upon his own sword. Without any assembly or election at all, Cinna and C. Marius declared themselves Consuls for the next year: and the same day whereon they entered into their Magistracy, Marius caused Sex. Licinius a Senator to be thrown down the rock Tarpeia and after many wicked and heinous crimes committed upon the Ides of January, he departed one of this world: a man whose name (if they were weighed together with his virtues) hardly could it be determined whether he were in war a better soldier, or in peace a more dangerous Citizen. For the Commem-orial which he in his armour saved, the same in his long gown he overthrew, first, with all manner of consequence and deceit: and last, by plain hostility and force of arms.

Of the LXXXI. Book.

Lucius Sulla straightly beleaguered Athens, which Archelais a governor under King Mithridates held with a garrison: and after much toil and labour won it. To the City he granted their liberty again, and restored unto the Citizens all that was their own. Magnesia the only City in Asia that remained true and loyal was most valiantly defended against Mithridates. Over and besides, here ye shall read the exploits performed by the Thracians in Macedony.

Of the LXXXII. Book.

Sylla vanquished in battle the power of King Mithridates which being kept Macedony in subjection, was now come into Thracia. He slew one hundred thousand enemies, and was Master of the Camp. Afterwards, when the war was renewed, he discomfited and defeated quite the Kings whole army. Archelais together with the Kings fleet yielded to Sylla. L. Valerius Flaccus the Consul and companion in government with Cinna, being sent to succeed Sylla, was (for his covetousness) so odious unto his army, that he was slain by C. Fimbria his own lieutenant, a most audacious and desperate person: and so the conduct and command of the army was transferred to Fimbria. Moreover, here is recorded what Cæsar in Asia Mithridates won: how cruelly he spoiled and vexed the Province: and how the Thracians made roids andursions into Macedony.

Of the LXXXIII. Book.

Caius Fimbria after he had discomfited certain forces of Mithridates won the City Pergamum, besieged the King there, and missed but a little of taking him prisoner. The City Ilion, which stood out and reserved it self to the behoof and devotion of Sylla, he forced and destroyed, and the greatest part of Asia he recovered. Sylla in many battles defeated the Thracians. When L. Cinna and C. Papirius Carbo who for two years together were Consuls of their own making, prepared war against Sylla (by the means of L. Valerius Flaccus the President of the Senate (who made an Oration in the Councill-house) and those who loved coward and sought for unity, effected it was in the end, that Embassadors should be sent unto Sylla to treat about a peace. Cinna was murdered by his own soldiers, whom he forced against their will to be embarked and to take a voyage against Sylla: by which occasion Carbo alone bare the Consulship.
Sylla being passed over into Asia, made peace with Mithridates upon this capitulation, That the King should quit these Provinces, namely, Asia, Bithynia, and Cappadocia. Fimbria being forsaken of his own army, which revolted unto Sylla, gave himself a sore wound, and yielding his neck unto his own bondslave, obtained his favour at his hands, as to dispatch him on righs.

Of the LXXXIV. Book.

Sylla returned: his answer was the Embassadors flew unto him from the Senate: That he would be ordered by them, in case these Quirites who (upon the burden of age of Cinna) stood unto him, might be restored. The Senate thought that a reasonable condition and just demand: but by means of Carbo and that faction, who made reckoning that war would be more commodious unto them, there ensued no agreement and accord. The same Carbo, whom he was intended to equal his power of all the towns and colonies of Italy, thereby to bind them upon their allegiance against Sylla, was by a general consent of the Senate crossed and inhibited. The same embassadors Carbo, by virtue of an act by the Senate granted, were followed the privileges of their suffrages and money: Q. Metellus Pius, who had sided with the nobility, whilst he lived in Africa, was by C. Fabius the Praetor disarmed: and by the faction of Carbo and those that followed the party of Marius, an act of Senate passed: That all armies and forces wheresoever should be called and discharged. The Libertines were distributed indifferently throughout the five and thirty tribes. Besides all this, there is specified the preparation of war which was made against Sylla.

Of the LXXXV. Book.

Sylla crossed the sea with an army over into Italy: and when these Embassadors which he sent to treat for peace were by the Consul C. Norbanus well entertained, he overcame the said Norbanus in a battle. And when he was about to assault the camp of L. Scipio the other Consul, with whom he had travelled and assayed all means to conclude peace, and could not compass it: the whole army of the Consul in general, being solicited by soldiers whom Sylla had sent out under-hand to that purpose, turned their engines unto him, and followed his standard, Scipio, whom he might have been killed was let go. Cn. Pompeius, the son of that C. Cicerus who won Asculum, enrolled an army of volunteers, and came unto Sylla with three legions: unto whom also the nobility all and whole ranged themselves, so as abandoning the City they repaired to the camp. Finally, in this book report is made of the expeditions performed by Captains of both sides throughout all Italy.

Of the LXXXVI. Book.

This year wherein C. Marius (the son of C. Marius) was by forcible means and strong hands created Consul before he was twenty years of age: C. Fabius in Africa was burnt quick in his own pavilion for his bloody cruelty and greedy avarice. L. Philippus, lieutenant unto Sylla, subdued Sardinia, after he had disarmed and slain Q. Antonius the Praetor. Sylla contracted a league with the States of Italy, to put them out of fear that he would not bereave them of their freedom of Rome and liberty of suffrages lately granted unto them. In like manner, upon assured confidence (that he had already) of undoubted victory, he commanded all those that were in suits and resorted unto him for jurisdiction, to adjourn their appearance in Court, and to appear at Rome. Whilst the City yet was divided and distressed two ways, L. Damasippus the Praetor, having according to the will and pleasure of C. Marius the Consul, gathered the Senate together, massacred all the nobility of the City. One of which number Q. Marcius Scaevola the arch Pontifex, as he stood, was in the very porch and entry of Vesta's Temple murdered. Besides this book containeth the war renewed by L. Murena against Mithridates in Asia.

Of the LXXXVII. Book.

Sylla after he had disarmed and overthrown the army of C. Marius, near a place called Sacripontis, besieged him within the town Praeneste. The City of Rome he recovered out of the hands of his enemies: and when Marius made an offer to sell forth he repelled him. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits achieved by his Lieutenants, with the like fortunes of that side in all places.

Of the LXXXVIII. Book.

Sylla after that he had defeated and put to the sword the army of Carbo at Clusium, Faventia, and Fidentia, chased him forth of Italy. With the Samnites, who alone of all the Italian nations had not yet laid down arms, he fought one small battle, and vanquished them near the City of Rome, even before the gate Collina: and thus having recovered and got into his hand the absolute managing of the state, he polluted and stained this most goodly and beautiful victory with the foulest cruelty that ever man committed. He cut the throats of 8000 in the great hostility called Villa Publica, even those that had yielded themselves. He set up the table of prescription and outlawry. The City of Rome and all Italy throughout filled with massacres. Amongst these he caused all the Praenestians, disarmed as they were, to be slain. Marius, a Senator by calling, he killed in this manner, by breaking his arms and legs, by cropping his ears, and digging out his eyes. Cn. Marius he besieged within Praeneste by Lucretius Aella and that side with Sylla: when he sought means of escape by a mine under the ground, seeing how he was environed by the army, flew himself within the said mine for perceiving that he could not escape, he and Pontius Telesinus, that accompanied him in this flight ran one at the other with their drawn naked swords: and when he had killed him, and was himself hurt, he found so much kindness at his slaves hands as to make an end of him quite.

Of the LXXXIX. Book.

Lucius Butus sent from Cn. Papyrius Carbo, who was arrived at Corcyra in a sifter boat to Lilybaeum, in special to see whether Pompey were there: being compassed and hemmed in round about by those vessels which Pompey had sent, overgrew his sword points to his body, and for the punishment against a feat within the boat, and so bending forward with the poise of his body was pierced through and died. Cn. Pompeius sent by the Senate with full commission of rate and command took Cn. Carbo prisoner, who was arrived to the Island Cosluta, and slew him, who lay a pining and weeping, like a woman, when he should die. Sylla became Dictator, and then which never any man had done besides him, kept his port abroad with 34,000 men or thereabouts going before him with their rods and axes. He altered the Style, and in that innovation established it. The Tribunes of the Commons be abridged of their authority, and wholly deprived them of their power to prefer and establish laws. The College of the Pontifices and Augurs be amplified and augmented to the number of 23. The body of the Senate be supplied out of the order of Gentlemen. The children of those whom he had proscribed and outlawed be disabled for being eligible to any honorable office, and of their goods made great sales, whereof at first he seized much by violence and had it away. A mighty mass of money he raised thereby, amounting to a hundred and fifty millions of Sesterces. He commanded Q. Lucetius Gellius to be killed in the very Forum of Rome for that he presumed without his leave and licence to sue for a Consulship; and when the people of Rome were highly offended at this indignity, he assembled them to a public audience, and before them avowed the fact and took it upon him. Cn. Pompeius in Africa, inquisit and slain in battle Cn. Domitius, one of the proscribed outlaws; and Hiarbas King of the Numidians, who prepared to lay war. He being but four and twenty years of age, and no better at yet than a gentleman of Rome (a thing that never any man attained unto) triumphed over Africa. C. Norbanus, a man who had been Consul, and now proscribed and outlawed, was apprehended in the City of Rhodes, and thereupon slew himself. Mutius likewise one of them, but were outlawed and out of protection, being come privately disguised with his head covered to the back door of Bassia his wives house, was not let in; for that she said he was an outlaw: whereupon he took the stab at his own hands; and with his own hands blood besprinkled the door of his wives house. Sylla recovered and won again Nola in Samnium. He brought seven and forty legions into the lands conquered from the enemies, planted them therein, and divided the grounds amongst them. He besieged the town Volaterræ, which yet stood out and bare arms; and at length upon surrender got it. Mytilene also, the only City in Asia, (which after that Mithridates was subdued maintained war) was fired and raised down to the ground.

Sylla departed this life, and this honour was done unto him by the Senate, that he was entered in Mæstfield. M. Lepidus going about to cancell and abolish the acts of Sylla, raised new war: and by Q. Catulus (his companion in government) was driven out of Italy: and when he prepared to wage war (but to no effect) in Sardinia, there he perished and came to his death. M. Brutus who held * Lumbardy, was by Cn. Pompeius slain. Q. Sertorius, another proscribed outlaw, fought a great war in the netherlands of Spain. Lucius Manlius the Pro-Consul, and M. Domitius a Lieutenant, were in fight overcome by Hercules the treasurer. Moreover, this book containeth the acts performed by P. Servilius the Pro-Consul against the Cilicians.

Of the XCII. Book.

Cn. Pompeius, being as yet but a gentleman of Rome, was sent with full commission of Consul to command against Sertorius. Certain Cities had Sertorius won by assault, and brought under many States to be at his devotion. Ap. Claudius the Pro-Consul overcame the Thracians in divers and sundry battles. Q. Metellus the Pro-Consul defeated and slew L. Hirtius the treasurer of Sertorius, with all his army.

Of the XCIII. Book.

Cn. Pompeius hitherto fought with Sertorius in doubtful combats, so as of both parts, one of the wings and points of the battell had the better hand. Q. Sertorius overthrow in fight Metellus and Perperna with two armies. Pompeius desirous to carry away his part in that victory, entered into the field, but made no forcing game of it. Afterwards Sertorius was besieged within Calagurium, by daily and continuall sallies forth, gave the enemies that lay in siege within as good as they brought. Over and besides, herein are contained the deeds achieved by Curio the Pro-Consul in Thrace against those Dardaniens, together with sundry cruel and bloody parts played by Q. Sertorius, even with those of his own side. For many of his own friends, and such as were with him outlawed, upon imputations of treason pretended against them, he put to death.

P. Servilius, the Pro-Consul in Cilicia, subdued the Isaurians, and won certain towns of the Pirates. Nicomedes King of Bithynia at his death made the people of Rome his full heirs, and his kingdom was reduced into the form of a Province. Mithridates contracted a league with Sertorius, and waged war against the people of Rome. Herein is shewed the great preparation of war that the King made as well by land as sea, and how he seized upon Bithynia. M. Aurelius Cotta the Consul was in battle vanquished by the King at Chalcedon. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits of Pompeius and Metellus against Sertorius, who in all warlike feats and martiall prowess was equal unto them, whom also he raised from the siege before the town Calagurium, and compelled to go into divers countries, Pompeius into the farther Province of Spain, and Pompeius into Gallia.

Of the XCV. Book.

Lucius Lucullus the Consul fought against Mithridates, and in horse-service had the better hand of him. Certain rades he made with good success; and when his soldiers called hard upon him for battle, he said them from mutiny. Deiotarus, a seararch of Gallogracia, defeated the captains of K. Mithridates who waged war in Phrygia. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate achievements of Pompeius against Sertorius in Spain.

Of the XCVI. Book.

Caius Curio the Pro-Consul vanquished and subdued the Dardaniens in Thrace. Threescore and fourteen sword-plaiers of Capua fled out of the fers-school of Lentulus at Capua: who having gathered together a number of slaves, and hired hands, raised war under the leading of Chrysis and Spartacus.

tacus, and vanquished in plain field, Cl. Pulcher a lieutenant, and P. Vatinius the Prator. L. Lucullus the Pro-Consul with the famine and the sword together tamed and subdued the host of Mithridates at the City Cizicus: and when they had chased him out of Bithynia, after many overthrows in war, and misfortunes of shipwrack at sea, wherewith his heart was quailed, he compelled him to flee into Pontus.

Of the XCVI. Book.

Quintus Arrius the Prator defeated and slew Chrysus the captain of the fugitives, and with him Calus Lenculus the Consul received a foil and overthrow at the hands of Spartacus. He also overcame in fight Lu. Gellius the Consul and Quintus Arrius. Sertorius was at a banquet slain by Manius Antonius and M. Perpenna with other conspirators in the eight year of his dukedom. A captain and brave warrior he was. He fought with Pompeius and Metellus, two famous Generals and Commanders. Many a time he saved his own, but more often he went away winner, howbeit, in the end he was abandoned and betrayed. The sovereignty command of that side was made over to Marcus [Perpenna,] whom Cn. Pompeius vanquished, took prisoner, and slew: so about the tenth year after the war began, he recovered Spain. C. Cassius the Pro-Consul, and Cneus Manlius the Prator were foiled by Spartacus in the field, and that war was committed over to the managing and conduct of M. Crassus the Prator.

Of the XCVII. Book.

Marcus Crassus the Prator first fought with a power of the fugitives aforesaid, consisting of Frenchmen and Germans, and won the better: for he slew 35000 enemies, and their captain Granicus. After that he warred against Spartacus, killed him also and 40000 with him. Manius Antonius the Prator maintained war unfortunately against the Cretensians, and by his death it took an end. M. Lucullus the Pro-Consul brought the Thracians under subjection. L. Lucullus had the upper hand in a battell of Mithridates in Pontus, and slew above 60000 enemies. M. Crassus and Cn. Pompeius were created Coss. and at Crassus immediately out of his Pratorship stepped to that dignity, so Pompey was of a gentleman of Rome and no better advanced thereunto, even before he had born the office of Treasurer. They restored again the Tribunes power and authority, by the means of Aurelius Cotta, the preeminence of judges also was transferred unto the Gentlemen of Rome. Mithridates seeing his own estate lying in despair, fled unto Tigranes King of Armenia for succour.

Of the XCVIII. Book.

Machabes the son of Mithridates, King of Bosphorus, was by L. Lucullus received into amity. Cn. L. Bennulus and L. Gellius the Censors administered their office with great severity and rigour, and deposed 60 from Senators dignity: they also held a review and purged the City. Enrolled there were 450000 Citizens of Rome. L. Metellus the Prator in Sicily fought fortunately against the pirates and rovers. The Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll, which by fire had been consumed, was re-edified by Q. Catulus, and dedicated anew. L. Lucullus in Armenia discomfited in many battells Mithridates and Tigranes, with a mighty power of both Kings. Q. Metellus the Pro-Consul having the charge of the war against the Cantabrigians, besieged the City Cydonia. C. Triarius, a lieutenant under Lucullus received a foil of Mithridates in fight. Lucullus was impeached and staid for pursuing Mithridates and Tigranes, that he could not accomplish his victory, by occasion of a mutiny among his own souldiers, who would not follow, because the Valerian Lexion forbode Lucullus, alledging that they had served their time fully out.

Of the XCIX. Book.

Quintus Metellus the Pro-Consul forced by assault Gnosos, Lycus, Cydonia, and many other Cities [in Crete] L. Roscius a Trib. of the Com. published a law, that the gentlemen of Rome should be allowed the 14 next seats in the scaffolds of the Theatre, to behold the games and plater. Cn. Pompeius being commanded by a law promulged unto the people for to pursue the rovers aforesaid, who had debarred and cut off all commerce for corn and victuals, within 74 daies rid the sea of them quite, and after the war with them finished in Cilicia, he received them upon submission, and gave them Cities and lands to possess. Moreover, this book contains the worthy exploits of Q. Metellus against the Cretensians. The letters also of Metellus and Cn. Pompeius, sent from the one to the other: in which Metellus, complaineth that Pompeius by sending his own lieutenant into Crete, to receive the surrender and homage of the Cities there, annulled and passed by the glory of those acts which he had achieved, Pompeius again rendereth a reason thereof, and alledges that so he ought to do.

Of the C. Book.

Caius Manilius, a Trib. of the Com. preferred a bill, to the exceeding displeasure and indignation of the nobles, that the war against Mithridates should be assigned to Pompey. His speech to the people imported and was effectual. Q. Metellus having subdued the Cretensians, gave laws unto that Island which until that time enjoyed freedom of State. Cn. Pompeius went his journey for to levy war against Mithridates, and with Phraates, King of the Parthians, he renewed the league. In a battell performed by horse-service he overcame Mithridates. Also herein is contained the war, first between Phraates King of the Parthians, and Tigranes King of the Armenians: afterwards between Tigranes the son and his father.

Whereupon he drank poison, and seeing it was not * effectfull and strong enough to dispatch him, he was killed by a French souldier, named Bitocna, whose helping hand he requested for to rid him out of the world. Cn. Pompeius subdued the Jews: their famous Temple of Jerusalem, which until that day never had suffered abuse and violence, he forced and won. Catiline by occasion that he had twice suffered a repulse in suing to be Consul, conspired together with Lentulus the Praetor, Cethegus, and many others, to massacre the Consul and the Senat, to set the City on fire, and to subvert and overthrow the State of the Common-wealth, and to this purpose had levied an army in Tuscany. This treason and conspiracy was by the industry of M. Tullius Cicero detected and found out. Catiline was banished the City. Of the C IV. Book.

The forepart of this book compriseth the site and description, together with the manners of Germany, C. Caesar at what time as he led his army against the Germans, at the request of the Hedyans and Segna-ians, whose territory by them was possessed, and who under the conduct of Ariovistus were come down into France, by an Oration to his army shaid the timorous disposition of the souldiers, which arose upon the fear they had of new and strange enemies: vanquished the Germans in plain fight, and drove them clean out of France. M. Cicero, by means of Pompeius (who among others made an Oration in his behalf) and of T. Annius Milo, a Tribune of the Commons, who likewise pleaded his cause, was with the exceeding joy of the Senat and all Italy called home from exile. Cn. Pompeius had commission for five year space to look unto the provision of corn and * fruits. Caesar overcame in fight the Ambians, Sueffians, Viromanduan, Atrebares (nations all of * Belgæ) of whom there was an exceeding multitude, and received them upon yielding to his protection. Afterwards he fought with passing great hazard and jeopardy against the Nervii, one of the foresaid States, and in fine utterly destroyed and extinguished their whole generation: for they had waged war so long, untill of 60000 armed men there remained but 300, and of 95 of their Noblemen three only escaped and no more. There passed a law for to reduce Cyprus into the form of a Province and to confiscate the Kings treasure: by vertue whereof, the managing of that affair was committed to C. Caro. Ptolemæus King of Egypt suffered many wrongs and injuries at his own subjects hands, and being by them expelled out of his kingdom came to Rome. C. Caesar in a battell at sea vanquished the Venetians, a State and City seated in the very Ocean. Last of all, it reporteth exploits by his Lieutenants performed with like good fortunes.

At what time as the assembly for election of Magistrates might be holden, by reason of the negotiations and inhibitions of C. Cato a Trib. of the Com. the Senate generally in token of sorrow put on mourning weeds. M. Cato in his suit for a Priestship suffered a repulse, and Vatinius was preferred before him. The same Vatinius whom he would have impeached the law whereby were granted to the Consuls the Provinces for five years, was Pompey the governor of both Spains, and Crassus Syria and the Parthian war, and was Caesar France and Germany, was by C. Trebonius a Tribune of the Commons, and the first maker of the said law, committed to prison. M. Gabinius the Pro-Consul of Achaia, after he had vanquished and put to sword the Germans in France, crossed over the Rhene, and subdued that part of Germany which is next thereto: which done, he sailed over into Britain with much trouble and damage, by reason of the cross and contrary winds: whither he was as soon as he fled little better when he was there: but when he had slain a mighty great number of men, he brought into subjection the rest of the Island.

Of the CVI. Book.

Iulia daughter to Caesar and sister Pompeius departed this life, and had this surpassing honour done unto her by the people, as to be entombed in Mars field. Many of the States of France revolted by the leading of Ambiorix a Duke of the Ebdomas, by whom Cotta and T. Aurunculeius the lieutenants of Caesar were by an ambuscade surprised and overthrown, and by means thereof they made the armies whereof they had the conduct were put to the sword. And at what time as the camp of the other legions also was besieged, assailed, and with difficulty defended, did among them Q. Cicero, who was Lord President of the Treviras: the enemies were by Caesar himself in person overthrown in fight, M. Crassus intending to war upon the Parthians passed over a river Euphrates, and being vanquished in battle, wherein his son was slain, after he had rallied the broken ends of his army, and retired them to a little hill, he was traitorously slain by the enemies (whose Captain was Surenas) in a garley and treachery of peace, and thereupon attached: but because he would not suffer any indignity and villany alive, he made resistance, and in that struggling of his was slain, and there was end of him.

Of the CVII. Book.

Claude Caesar having vanquished the Treviras in Gaul, passed over the second time into Germany: where finding an ambuscade to meet him, returned into France, where the Ebdomas and other Cities which had conspired, he overcame, put their R. Annius Milo a competitor of the Consulship, the Commons of Rome bore in a funeral fire within the Curia [Hortilia]. By occasion of a sedition variance between two Candidates for a Consulship, namely, Hyppien Scipio, and Milo, who with force and arms tried the issue by the sword: C. Pompeius was sent out of the Senate to suppress such pernicious debates. Crassus Consul he was the third time in his office, and which prerogative no man ever had: alone without Collegue, a commission was granted for him to suppress the death of Pub. Clodius, by virtue whereof Milo was judicially condemned, and had his judgment to be banished. A bill was proposed, that C. Caesar notwithstanding he was absent should be accepted of in the election of Consuls, albeit M. Cato was unwilling thereto, and gain said it. Moreover, this book containeth the warlike acts achieved by C. Caesar against the Gauls (who generally in manner revolted) under the leading of Vercingetorix the Arvernian: also the painful sieges of certain Cities, and namely, of *Avaricum in Bituriges, and *Gergovia in Avergne.

Of the CVIII. Book.

Claude Caesar vanquished the Gauls at *Alexia, and received all the Childe in France which had been in arms, into his protection upon their submission. C. Cassius the treasurer of M. Crassus, put the Parthians to the sword, who had passed over into Syria. M. Cato sued to be Consul, and had the repulse, and Ser. Sulpitius with M. Marcellus were created Consuls: C. Caesar subdued the *Bellovaci, with other States and Cities in France. Also is contained the strife and debate between the Consuls about sending of a successor to C. Caesar. For M. Marcellus the Consul was earnest in the Senate, that C. Caesar should come to stand for a Consulship, considering that he by a law made in that behalf was to govern his provinces unto that time of his Consulship. End of all, the warlike deeds of Mar. Bibulus in Syria are here reported.

Of the CIX. Book.

The causes of the civil war and their beginnings be here set down. The continuance likewise about a successor to be sent in lieu of Caesar, who disputed flatly to dismiss the armies, unless Pompey also discharged.

charged his forces. Moreover, this book treateth of the actions preferred by C. Curio, a Tribune of the Commons, first against Caesar, and afterwards for him. When there passed an act of the Senate, that one or other without fail should be employed to succeed Caesar, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, two other Tribunes (for that by their negative and inhibitions they seemed to cross and stay that act) were expelled the City: and a commission was directed by the Senate to the Consuls, and to Cn. Pompeius, in this form, To see that the Common-wealth sustained no damage: C. Caesar intending to persecute his adversary, came with his army into Italy. Cornutus together with La Domitius and L. Lentulus he took prisoner, and led them go again: but Cn. Pompeius, and the rest of his side he neverly chased forth of Italy.

Of the CX. Book.

Cains Caesar besieged Massilia, which had shut the gates against him: who leaving C. Trebonius and D. Brutus in the siege, took a journey into Spain, where he received upon submission La Afranius and C. Petreius, two lieutenants of Pompeius, together with seven legions. He dismissed them all with no harm done unto them. Varrus also a lieutenant of Pompeius, together with his army came under his obsequies. The Gauls and he were reconciled and gave the City unto him. The Massilians after two overthrowes in sea-fight, and a long siege which they had endured, submitted at last and were at the devotion of Caesar. C. Antonius a lieutenant of Caesar fought an unfortunate battle against the Pompeians, and in Illyricum was taken prisoner: during which war the inhabitants of * Opitergium, beyond the river of Padus (who were the auxiliaries of Caesar) seeing their chained bridge of boats and lighters lacked up and fast upon within the enemies ships, rather than themselves should fall into the hands of their enemies, ran one upon another, and died every one. C. Curio, a lieutenant of Caesar in Affricke, after he had fought against Varrus a captain of the Pompeians, and together with his army defeated him, and cut in pieces by his hands the King of * Mauritania. C. Caesar passed the sea into Greece.

Of the CXI. Book.

Cains Cecilius Rufus the Prator going about to raise commotions and seditions all that ever he could within the City, and having solicited the commons upon the hope of cancelling all debts, was first deposed from his Magistracy, and after driven out of the City. Then he banded with Milo a banished person, who had levied a power of fugitive and lawless: but both of them in this preparation of war came short of their purpose and were slain. Cleopatra queen of Egypt was by her brother Ptolomæus expelled out of her kingdom. By reason of the avarice and cruelty of Q. Catulus the Prator, the * Celtæ, dubians in Spain, together with two Varian legions, revolted from Caesar and his side: Cn. Pompeius was besieged by Caesar at Brundisium: but having won his fences with the guards thereto belonging, and that with great loss of the adverse part, he was delivered from the siege. But after the war was translated into Thessaly, he was at Pharsalia in a battle overthrowen. There remained still within the camp of Cæsar, who by nature framed for nothing more wise than war, Caesar pardoned all those of the adverse part, who after his victory submitted themselves to his mercy.

Of the CXII. Book.

Herein is related the fearful condition of the side which was vanquished, and how they fled in sundry parts of the world. Cn. Pompeius being arrived in Egypt, by the commandment of Ptolomæus the King, as yet an infant under age, and by his son of Theodorus his mother and seducer, who might of all other over-rule the King, also of one Pthotinus, was killed by the hands of Achilla, who had a warrant to execute that feat, even in the very barge before he was landed. But Cornelia his wife, and Sextus Pompeius his son fled back into Cyprus. Caesar three daies after the foresaid victory, pursued Pompeius: and when Theodorus presented unto him his head and finger of his finger, he was displeased in his heart and wept withall. He entered Alexandria without any danger, notwithstanding the troubles and hariburly therein. Caesar was created Dictator. He restored Cleopatra unto the kingdom of Egypt: and when Ptolomæus made war by their advice and himself, who moved him to murder Pompeius, Caesar vanquished him, with great perill and hazard of himself. As Ptolomæus fled, his vessel wherein he was embarked ran a ground in Nilus, and there stuck fast. Besides, this book sheweth the painful and toilsome journey of Marcus Cato with his legions, in Affricke through the desert wilderness: and the war which Cn. Domitius fortantly managed against Phraates the Parthian King.

Of the CXIII. Book.

When the side of Pompeius had gathered heart and strength in Affricke, the sovereign command thereof was committed to P. Scipio, for M. Cato, who before had equal power and commission with him, gave place and yielded his right. Now when it was debated in council as touching the subversion and utter ruin of Utica, for that the City was so inclined and favourable to Caesar: while M. Cato stood stiffly in this point, that it should not be destroyed: and Juba (the King) was earnest to have it raised: the guard and keeping thereof was committed unto Cato. The son of Pompey the great, having levied forces in Spain (the conduct and leading whereof, neither Afranius nor Petreius were willing to undertake) made fresh war upon Caesar. Pharnaces King of Pontus and son of Mithridates, endured no time of war, but was soon overcome. At what time as P. Dolabella a Tribune of the com. raised seditions in Rome, by means of a law by him published in the behalf of bankrupts. That the old debts should be stricken off, and new order taken with the creditors: upon which occasion there ensued a commotion of the commons. M. Antonius, General of the Cavalry, entered the City with a strength of souldiers: and eight hundred of the commons lost their lives. Cæsar discharged all his old souldiers, who in a mutiny demanded the sume, and having sailed into Affrick, he fought against the power of R. Juba with exceeding great jeopardy.

Of the CXIV. Book.

Cælius Bassus a gentleman of Rome, and one of Pompeys side, leaved war in Syria. Sextus Cæsar was forsaken by the legion which revolted, and went to Bassus, and also slain. Cæsar vanquished Scipio the Prætor, Afranius, and Juba, near Taplos, and forced their camp. Cato hearing thereof, wounded himself at Utica: and when his son came between and staid his hand, his hurt was dressed, but in the very cure, as the wound was newly lanced again, he yielded up his vitall breath and died, in the 49 year of his age. Petreius killed Juba and himself. P. Scipio in his ship was beset round, and at his death, which he took manfully, he uttered a brave speech: for when the enemies made search and enquiry what was become of the General, The General quoth he is well. Faustus and Afranius were slain. Cato's son had his pardon. Brutus, a lieutenant of Cæsar vanquished the Bellovaci in France that rebelled.

Of the CXV. Book.

Cæsar rode in four triumphs over France, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa. A solemn feast he made, and exhibited unto the people (beins of all sorts) unto M. Marcellus a man of Consular dignity, at the request of the Senat he granted leave to returne, which Marcellus could not enjoy, the benefit of this grace and favour, by reason that he was murdered at Athens by Cn. Magius Chilo, his own client and vassall. Cæsar also held a review of the City, wherein were enrolled 150000 Citizens, whereas before there had been numbered 400000. See the calamity of civill war. He took a voyage into Spain against Sex. Pompeius: and after many rodes and expeditions on both sides made, and some cities forced, in the end he attained one small victory for all before the City Munda, but with exceeding perill and danger. Sex. Pompeius escaped and fled.

Of the CXVI. Book.

Caius Cæsar triumphed a fift time over Spain. When many honours and those right excellent, were by the Senat ordained for him, and namely, among the rest, to be called Pater Patriæ: to be sacrosanct and inviolable: and withall to be Dictator for ever: he gave occasion to be envied and maliced: first in that when the Senat bestowed upon him these honourable titles, at what time as he sat before the Temple of Venus Genetrix, he rose not up nor did reverence unto them: second, for that when M. Antonius the Cos. and his Collegues ran among the Luperæ, he laid upon his ivory chair of estate the wreath or diadem which was by him set upon his head: thirdly, because he deprived from their authority Epi- dius Marullus and Cæcilius Flavius, two Tribunes of the Commons, who went about to bring him into hatred, as if he affected and sought to be King. Upon these causes, a conspiracy was contrived against him, whereof the principall heads were M. Brutus, C. Trebonius, and C. Cassius, also one of his own side D. Brutus: by whom he was massacred in the court of Pompeius, and received 23 wounds: and by these murderers was the Capitoll seized and held. But after that the Senat had passed a decree to forget this murder, the conspirators aforesaid, having received for their security the children of Antonius and Lepidus, as hostages, came down from the Capitol. By the last will and testament of Cæsar, C. Octavius (his sisters son) was made his half heir, and adopted into his own name. The body of Cæsar being brought into Mars field, was by the Com. burnt in a funeral fire before the Rostre. The honour and dignity of Dictatorship was ever abolished. Chameces a person of most vile and base condition, avowed himself to be the son of C. Marius: and whiles he raised a sedition among the credulous common people, was cut off and killed.

Of the CXVII. Book.

Caius Octavius from out of Epirus repaired to Rome: for Cæsar had sent him thither before, when he minded to make war in Macedony, where he was received with good tokens and fortunate presages, and withall took upon him the name of Cæsar. In this confusion of state and tumultuous trouble of all things, Lepidus attained by stealth to the highest pontificall dignity. But when M. Antonius the Consul demeaned himself most lordly and proudly in his place, and by force published a law as touching the exchange of the Provinces: and withal offered much wrong and abuse to Cæsar, when he made request that he would assist and stand with him in revenge of those that murdered his uncle: Cæsar, to the end that he might make both himself and the common-weal strong against him, raised and excited the old souldiers whom he had before placed in Colonies. The fourth legion also, and that called Marcia, fell from Antonius and turned their ensignes to Cæsar. After this more besides (by occasion that many through the cruelty of A. Antonius were murdered every where in their tents) because they were once suspected, revolted from him and ranged to Cæsar. D. Brutus purposing to stop Antonius as he should passe into Lombardy, seized upon Mutina with an army. Finally, this book declareth the running to and fro of those on both parts, to be possessed first of the Provinces, and the preparation for war.

For as he entered the City, the circle of the sun gathered about it an Halo round like a rainbow or garland, even over his head.

Of the CXVIII. Book.

Marcus Brutus in Greece (under a pretence of maintaining the state, and enterprising war against Antonius) possessed himself of the army wherof Ventus had the conduct together with the Province. But Cæsar, who first took arms in defence of the C. M. the government and command of a Pre-Prætor was granted, with the Prætorian ornaments and ensigns thereto belonging, and withall he had this addition to be reputed Pre-Prætor. M. Antonius besieged D. Brutus in Mutina. Certain Embassadors were sent unto him from the Senat as concerning peace, but little availed they in the treaty and conclusion thereof. The people of Rome generally betook them to arms and soldiers haue Brutus in Epirus subdued C. Antonius the Prætor together with his army.

Of the CXIX. Book.

Cneus Trebonius was by the guilfull practice of P. Dolabella, slain in Asia: for which fall Dolabella was by the Senat judged an enemy to the State. When Pansa the Cof. was at the point to lose the field against Antonius, A. Hirtius the other Cof. came with his army to the rescue, discomfited the forces of M. Antonius, and so made the fortune of both parts alike and equal. Afterwards, Antonius being vanquished by Hirtius and Cæsar, fled into France, and joyned unto him M. Lepidus with the legions which were under him. Both he and all they who were within his holds in garrison, were by the Senat attainted. Aulus Hirtius, who after his victory was slain within the camp of the enemies, and L. Pansa, who died of a wound received in an unfortunate fight were both buried in Mars field. To C. Cæsar the only Captain of the three now remaining alive, the Senat was not so kind as they ought to have been: for having ordained that D. Brutus (who by Cæsar had been delivered from the siege at Mutina) should triumph, they made no thankful remembrance of Cæsar and his soldiers, as was meet and requisite. For which discourtesies C. Cæsar (being reconciled to M. Antonius by the means and mediation of M. Lepidus) came to Rome with an army: and when they were sore dismayed at his coming, who had before intreated him so unkindly, created Consul he was [with Q. Pædinus] being but nineteen years of age, or not full twenty, for he wanted one day, as Velleius Paterculus saith.

Of the CXX. Book.

Cæsar now Consul, proposed a law for an inquisition to be made of them by whose means his father Cæsar was killed. and by vertue of that law, M. Brutus, C. Cassius, and D. Brutus were endured, restrained and condemned in their absence. When together with M. Antonius, A. P. Pollio also, and Magnatius Plancius had joyned their arms, and thereby much strengthened and augmented their forces, D. Brutus whom the Senat had sent with commission to pursue Antonius, being now forlorn of his obligations and fled, was at the commandment of Antonius (into whose hands he fell) killed by one Capennus a Burgonian. Caius Cæsar contracted a peace with Antonius and Lepidus, wherein it was capitulated between them that those three should for five years have the sovereignty over all, only to set in order and establish the state of the common-weal: to wit, himself, Lepidus, and Antonius, and each of them prescribe and outlaw their own adversaries and enemies. In which proscription were contained the names of very many Gentlemen of Rome, and one hundred and thirty Senators, and amongst the rest were L. Pansa the brother of M. Lepidus, L. Cæsar the uncle of Antonius by the Mother, and M. Cicero, slain by Popilius, a legionary soldier, in the 63 year of his age, whose head and hands was set upon the Rostra. Moreover, this book sheweth the deeds by M. Brutus achieved in Greece.

Of the CXXI. Book.

Cassius, who had in commission from the Senat, to pursue by force of arms Dolabella, judged an enemy to the Common-weal, being born out by the authority and warrant of the State, possessed himself of Syria, and became Master of three armies which were in that Province. He besieged Dolabella within the City of Laodicea, and put him to death. C. Antonius was likewise taken prisoner, and by commandment from M. Brutus slain.

Of the CXXII. Book.

Marcus Brutus had but bad success in fight against the Thracians. After that all the Provinces beyond sea, and the armies, were under his hands and Caius Cassius: they completed but together at Smyrna, what course to take for the future war. Publicola the brother of M. Messala they vanquished, and yet by common consent they pardoned him.

Of the CXXIII. Book.

Sextus Pompeius the son of Magnus, assembled together out of Epirus a number of outlaws and banished persons, and having a long time with his army robbed only by way of prey, and seized as yet upon the possession of no piece upon the land, first seized Messana, a town in Sicily, and afterwards the the whole Province. And after that A. Pompeius Rhodius the Prator there, was by Pompey slain: he the said Pompey in a battell at sea vanquished Q. Salvidienus, a Lieutenant of Caesar. Caesar and Antony with their armies sailed over to Cyprus: and thence to wage war against Brutus and Cassius. Quintus Cornificius in Africk was slain by the T. Sallius, the Captain of the Cassian faction.

Of the CXXII. Book.

Caesar and Antony fought a Philipp with variable fortune against Brutus and Cassius. In the right of both battles the latter, and each of them won the other's camp. But the death of Cassius was it that turned the ballance and made the difference: who being in that point that revolved and went down, supposed that the whole army and main battell was discomfited, and so killed himself. In another conflict after wards, M. Brutus also was overcome, and there ended his life: for he increased Strato (that accompanied him in his flight) to set his sword point to his throat, and so he was slain. The same did send forth more of the principall Romans: among whom was Q. Hortensius likewise slain.

Of the CXXV. Book.

Caesar left Antony (for to his share fell the Empire of some Provinces beyond sea) and returned into Italy. He divided lands among his old soldiers. The mutinies of his own army by occasion that the soldiers were seduced by Fulvia the wife of M. Antonius and rose against their Generall, he repressed with exceeding danger and jeopardy. L. Antonius the Consul and brother to M. Antonius, by the suggestions counsell and persuasion of the said Fulvia, made war upon Caesar: and having procured those nations to side and take part with him, whose lands had been made over and assigned to the old soldiers, and so he had discomfited M. Lepidus, who with an army had the government and guard of the City, and so he was driven by way of his flight into Rome.

Of the CXXVI. Book.

Caesar when he was but three and twenty years of age, besieged L. Antonius in the town Perusia: and when he made sundry offers to sally out and break forth, he repelled and chased him back, yea, and for very hunger forced him to yield and take under his obedience. As for Antony himself and all his soldiers, he pardoned, but Perusia he rased and destroyed. Finally, after he had brought all the armies of the adverse side to submit and to stand to his mercy, he finished the war without effusion of any blood.

Of the CXXVII. Book.

The Parthians, under the conduct of Labianus, who had taken part with Pompey, and then fled into Syria: overcame Odius Sabinus, a Lieutenant of M. Antonius, and held all that Province in their power. M. Antonius being solicited by the instigation of his wife, Fulvia, to make war against Caesar, yet he was hindered, because he should have no less hindrance to the accord and agreement of the three rulers in their Triumvirate. Then made he a peace with Caesar, and took to wife his sister Octavia. Q. Salvidienus who completed mischief against Caesar, he slew and betrayed: who being thereupon condemned, wrought his own death. Ventidius a Lieutenant under Antonius, overcame the Parthians in a small, and chased them forth of Syria, having before slain their Leader Labianus. When at Sextus Pompeius held Sicily, and being a great enemy and ill neighbour to Italy, stood there supporting of arms and tumults by sea: upon request Caesar and Antony made peace with him for this consideration, that he should govern Sicily and his Province. Also herein are set forth the troubles and wars of Africk.

Of the CXXVIII.

When Sext. Pompeius infested the sea again with rovery, and piracy, and would not make good, and maintain that peace, which he had wrought of Caesar, he was forced upon necessity to undertake war against him, and in two naval battels fought with doubtfull event. L. Ventidius a Lieutenant of M. Antonius, vanquished the Parthians in Syria and slew their King. The Jews also were by Antonius Lieutenant subdued. Herein besides is set down the preparation for the Sicilian war.

Of the CXXIX. Book.

Sundry battels were fought at sea against Sext. Pompeius with variable issue: so as, of Caesars two fleets, the one which was conducted by Agrippa, got the better hand: but the other led by Caesar himself, had the overthrow: and the soldiers being set a fire, were in exceeding great danger. But afterwards Pompeius was defeated and banished into Sicily. Marcus Lepidus crossed the sea from Rome of Africk, and so he took part with Caesar in his wars against Sea Pompeius. But when Caesar turned upon him also, he was abandoned of his army, and being content to resign up the honour and dignity of the Triumvirate, obtained of M. Agrippa was by Caesar rewarded with a new crown, an honour to no man ever granted before him.

Of the CXXX. Book.

Marcus Antonius, in his rising times with Cleopatra, turned into the Province of Media, with three hundred legions, and sixteen thousand horsemen, to fight against the Parthians, and a few days left two of his legions, seeing nothing prosper well on his side, he retired back. But still the Parthians followed him in chase: whereupon in exceeding great haste, and great peril of the whole army, he returned into Armenia: so as in 27 daies he fled three hundred miles. About 8000 men he lost by tempestuous weather. But he was himself the occasion that he suffered this dangerous tempest, ever and when the Parthian war which unfortunately he entered, he might have avoided in Armenia, for he had made to his love Cleopatra.

Of the CXXXI. Book.

Ser. Pompeius having once submitted, while he was in the protection of M. Antonius, went down to Syria against him in Asia: but by his Lieutenants he was surprised and slain. Cleopatra had the victory of the old soldiers, which with great mischief was begun: he subdued the Iapides, the Dalmatians and Pannonians. Antonius having upon his word and promise of safety and protection trained unto him Artabazides the King of Armenia, commanded him to be laid up fast in Irom, and gave the kingdom of Armenia to his own son, which he had by Cleopatra: for now by this time he began to adore her as his wife, upon whom long before he was enamoured and doted in love.

Of the CXXXII. Book.

Caisar subdued the Dalmatians in Illyricum. When M. Antonius for the love of Cleopatra (who bore him two sons, Philadelphus and Alexander) would never return to the City of Rome, nor after the time of the Triumvirat expired, resign up that dignity and government, but prepared for war which he meant to levy against Rome and Italy: and thereto had raised a mighty power, as well of forces as of land: and with all had renewed the marriage with Octavia, Caesar's sister, and sent her a letter of divorcement, and so put her away: Caesar thereupon, with an army sailed into Epirus. The battles were afterwards, and the horse fought, wherein Caesar had the upper hand, he here retired.

Of the CXXXIII. Book.

Marcus Antonius was with his fleet overcome at Actium, and thereupon fled to Alexandria, where being by Caesar besieged, and in utter despair of recovering his former state, but moved especially upon a false rumour that was spread, how Cleopatra was killed, he slew himself. When Caesar was now Master of Alexandria, Cleopatra like wise because she would not fall into the hands of the conqueror, willingly procured her own death. Caesar upon his return to the City of Rome, had the honour of three triumphs: the one over Illyricum, another for the victory at Actium, and the third in regard of Cleopatra. Then when he had finished all civil wars which had continued 21 years, M. Lepidus, the son of Lepidus the Triumvir, conspired against Caesar, and while he was about to make war, was prevented and slain.

Of the CXXXIV. Book.

Caisar having for the State in good order, and reduced all Provinces into one certain form, was surnamed also Augustus, and the month Sextilis to honour his name was likewise called. While he sat in a situation at Narbonne, he took a review of the three Provinces of Gaul, which his father (Caesar) had conquered. The war which M. Crassus made against the Bactrians, Indians, and other nations, is here reported.

Of the CXXXV. Book.

The war which M. Crassus levied against the Thracians, as also which Caesar made upon the Sarmatians is here set down. Likewise how the Salassi, a people inhabiting the Alps, were utterly subdued.

Of the CXXXVI. Book.

Rhetia was conquered by Tiberius Nero, and Drusus his nephew's son. Agrippa Caesar's son in law died: and by Drusus was the generall review and tax taken.

Of the CXXXVII. Book.

The Cities of Germany situated on either side the Rhene, were by Drusus besieged and assailed. There was a revolt and insurrection which arose in France, by reason of the foolish review of the Gauls, which was suppressed. An altar was erected unto Divus Caesar at the confluence of the two rivers, Arar and Rhodanus: and a Priest was created to offer thereupon pro C. Julius Vercondaridubus an Helvet.

Of the CXXXVIII. Book.

Here is shewed how the Thracians were by L. Pison tamed. Likewise how the Therufci, Temachate-sthe Catti, and other nations of Germany beyond the Rhene, were subdued and brought under by Drusus. Octavia the sister of Augustus departed this life, having buried before, her son Marcellus:
whose monuments still remain, namely, the Theatre and gallery bearing his name, as if they had been dedicated by Marcellus.

Of the CXXXIX. Book.

The war which Drusus managed against the nations beyond Rhene is here reported. In which war the chief persons that fought were Senecius and Ancilius, Tribunes of the Nervian State. Nero the brother of Drusus subdued the Dalmatians and Pannonians. Peace was contracted with the Parthians: and upon capitulation the military ensigns were delivered up again to their King, which first under the conduct of Crassus, and afterwards of Antonius were lost, and by them taken.

Of the CXL. Book.

In this book is related the war which Drusus fought against the Cities and States of Germany beyond the Rhene. Himself fell from his horse and brake his leg, by reason that his horse fell thereon: upon which fracture he died thirty daies after. His corps was by his brother Nero (who being sent for upon the news of his sickness rode in post) brought through to Rome, and bestowed in the tomb of C. Julius. Praised he was by Caesar Augustus his father in law, and at his funerals for a small farewell, he was entitled with many honourable names.

To the Reader.

The history of Titus Livius, as it was by him passing well penned otherwise, and none thereto in Latine comparable: so in the calculation and date of times, which they call Chronology (a singular light to give direction in a story) he is somewhat defective and unlike himself, so as he cannot be praised without exception. But if a man consider the huge volumes which he wrote, and namely, in his declining age; the variety and disagreement of former authors, whom he followed, who before him faulted also in this point: and whereof he much complaineth; he is to be pitied and pardoned, if his memory failed somewhat in this behalf.
For where shall we find a man that is in parva rebus, omnique ex parte beatus? And indeed, if we weigh the thing aright, as it was a profession by it self, and required a whole man: so many travelled therein alone, and they that performed well but it only, deserved high thanks and commendation. And to let many others pass, how worthily is T. Pomponius Atticus praised by Cicero his friend, for digesting the head Magistrates of 700 years in one book? As for Verrius Flaccus, who lived in the time of Augustus Caesar, he collected a catalogue and register of the chief Rulers of Rome, how they were chosen successively, and how they governed from time to time: which as he caused to be cut and engraven in a marble wall within the Capitol for a perpetuall memory to posterity; so thereby he deserved also to have his own statue erected near the Temple of Vesta, for an everlasting memorial of so great a benefit. But what is there so durable, that time wasteth not?
What so conspicuous and evident, but troublesome daies may overwhelm and hide in oblivion?
Thus amidst that havock which the Goths and Vandals made in Italy, there remained not one fourth part extant of Livius story: thus in that generall confusion of Rome, these records of Verrius Flaccus were defaced, broken, and buried deep under the ruins of the Capitoll and other stately edifices. But the revolution of times, as it hath brought to light again some reliques of Livy: so it hath discovered also those marbles of Verrius: for in the time of Paul the third, Pope of Rome, the fragments of the said stones were digged out of the ground between the Roman Forum and the broad street Via Sacra; brought forth also & laid abroad in the Capitol to the view of the world.
To which, as the true touch-stone, certain learned men of late daies have laid to their own labors in that kind, namely, Bartholomew Marliani of Millain, Onuphrius Panvinus of Verona, Charles Si- gonius of Modena, and Francis Robertellus of Udine: and comparing the same as also the annals gathered by Henry Glareanus before time, with the foresaid antiquities of Verrius late found, have recovered much light to the history of Livy, and supplied his wants in that behalf. I thought it not amiss therefore to gratifie my countrymen in some measure this way also, and deliver the same in English which I found annexed to the best editions in Latine, as followeth.

A CHRONOLOGIE TO THE HISTORY OF TITUS LIVIUS,

Compiled according to the Tables and Records of Verrius Flaccus in the Capitoll, and set out with most profitable Notes, shewing the variety and disagreement of Authors about the names of the Roman Consuls.

The causes of dissent and repugnance in Historiographers, as touching the computation and relating of the years from the foundation of the City of Rome.

Ince we intend to set forth a Kalender or Register of the Consuls mentioned in the History of Livius, which by reason of uncertainty, obscurity, and discordance of the times, is so dark and intricate, that not only the learned and most experienced Historians of our age, but the best writers of the Roman story in ancient time very often complained thereof; we think it not impertinent to our purpose, briefly to search into the causes of this dissent: which being once known, we may follow that account of the times, which seemeth to accord best with the Historiall truth, and to be grounded upon the authority and testimony of the most authentick and approved writers. For seeing that an History (as Cicero hath most truly said) is the witness of times; what is more unfitting for it, than to mis and want that which is the chiefeest point therein, and without due and diligent reckoning made, to be ignorant what was first and what was last done? It seemeth therefore, that of this diversity in the account and computation of the Roman Consuls, there be three especiall causes.

The first is, for that the year in which the first Consuls entred into that Magistracy, is by the Roman Historiographers, not after one sort but diversly set down. For Dionysius (a most diligent writer of the Acts of Romans) in his first book, in the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth, reporteth, that the KK. reigned 244 years: which also is collected out of the yearly computation gathered by Varro and approved by the authority of others. For Messala reporteth, how upon the expulsion of the KK. which hapned in the 244 year after the foundation of the City, the Romans were ruled under the yearly government of Consuls. To which opinion Livy also subscribeth in the end of his first book, saying, that the regiment of KK. continued 244 years from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and liberty thereof. But Eutropius in his first book writeth that the seven Kings reigned in Rome 243 years: which account agreeth with Sex. Rufus in his abridgement. In which variety this is to be observed, that these two last named reckon the years only of every Kings reign, and out of the whole and gross sum leave out the year of the interreign, which Dionysius, Livius, Messala, and the rest insert between, and that right truly and upon good reason: for after the death of Romulus, the interreign continued one year. Consider then and examine the thing diligently, and ye shall find, that in reckoning the years of every Kings reign in severall, Eutropius and Senatus Rufus both, attribute as many years to the Kings government, as Denis. Livy, and the rest: so that this difference is not much. But others there be (as Eusebius hath delivered in his Chronicles) who write, that the KK. reigned but 243 years, and take the interregency withall: whose judgment, Orosius, Iornandes, and Beda seem to follow. For Orosius in the first chapter of his second book recordeth, that Brutus the Consul in that very year, namely the 244, put his own sons to death. The Kings reigned not precisely so many years just, but, for that some (and namely, Romulus) went over some months and daies, Dionysius and Livius reckoned them for a full year, and laid it to Tarquinius Priscus: but the other above-named, together with Eusebius, left out those odd months and daies (because they made not up a compleat year) and assigned but only seven and thirty years to the reign of King Priscus. To this may be added another reason of the like nature: namely, that as divers authors have doubtfully reported the year, so they are no more certain of the month and day on which the first Consuls began their government. For Plutarch in his Problems writeth, that they entred upon the first day of January: but Macrobius in the first book of his Saturnalia and seventh chapter, seemeth to imply that they took their Consuls place the first of June, saying, (according to the opinion of others) That June took the name of Junius Brutus: for that in this month, and namely, upon the first day thereof (according to a vow whereto he was obliged by the banishment of Tarquin) he solemnized a sacrifice to the goddess Cernea upon mount Calvus.

Othres

Others again write, how this hapned the 24 of February; grounding herein upon the old antiquities and records of stone, together with the testimony of Ovid, who in the second book of his Kalender thus writeth:

King Tarquin with his sons then fled: The Consuls yearly bear

The sovereign rule at Rome: since that, no King ever reign'd there.

Some there are besides of opinion, that they entred the first day of July: and of their mind seemeth Joachimus Perionius to be, in his third book of the Greek Magistrates. In this repugnancy therefore of opinions, very doubtfull it is which to follow. As for that of Plutarch, it hath long since been clearly and learnedly confuted by two great and excellent clarks, Omphrius Panvinus, and Sigonius: since it is plain that it was the six hundred year from the foundation of the City, and not before, that the Consuls began their government the first of January. But in setting down the certain day, they themselves are not well agreed. For Sigonius after Marlianus inclineth this way and saith, That the first day of the Consuls government was the six and twentieth day of May. But Panvinus thinketh that the first Consuls were created the 26 day of February. And this diversity is found not only in the day when the first Consuls took their government, but also in the time after ensuing. What was the usuall day of any month whereon the Consuls were wont to begin their Magistracy, a man can hardly find any certainty before the six hundred year from the Cities foundation. In the four and fortieth year verily after the Kings were exiled the first day of July, as Livy writeth, was the ordinary day for yearly Magistrates to take their place: but how many years following, that order continued, or at what time it was changed, he shewed not before he cometh to the three hundred and two year, and then he saith in his third book. That the thirteenth of May was the ordinary day for Magistrates to begin their government. Thus much at leastwise we may collect by him (when he saith that this time was solemn) that he meant not two or three years only, but many. For that is properly called solemn, which is by law usually observed. Again, we read a little after the beginning of the fift book, that this time also was altered: for whereas the first day of December was the usuall time that Magistrates began to execute their office, he saith, that it was changed, in these words, The principall Nobles and Lords of the Senat, were it upon the default or the infortunity of their Generals (that is shamefull an overthrow was received) Jopined and advised, not to expect and stay for the ordinary time of the election, but presently to create new military Tribunes in Consuls authority, who should enter into their government the first day of October, &c. Which opinion of theirs imported, and the whole house accorded to it: whereupon the other Tribunes gain said it. But Sergius and Urginius withstood this Act of the Senat, and denied flatly to resign up their dignity before the eleventh of December, the ordinary day of taking their oath and beginning their Magistracy. And a little after, within one page, he sheweth that the usuall day of entrance into government was altered from the eleventh of December to the first of September, saying, When this speech was received with a generall applause of all men, and that the Nobles and Lords of the Senat &c. But this day was kept but a few years. For about six years after, he saith, by occasion that both Consuls lay sick it was ordained that the first of July should be the ordinary day. And this also I find was changed to another, whatsoever it was, for named it is not: and therefore uncertain. But this hapned in the four hundred and thirteenth year after the Cities foundation: as Livy about the beginning of the eighth book sheweth in these words: And when the Consuls were commanded to resign up their Magistracy before the time, to the end that new Consuls might the sooner be created, against so great troubles of war, &c. For in these words [The sooner, &c.] he declareth that the usuall day of entrie into government was then changed. But as it is not certainly set down what day this was; so the other was as well known: for soon after, and namely, the eighth year following it was appointed, to wit, the first day of July. Immediately therefore (quoth he) the new Consuls, L. Aemilius Mamercus, and Cn. Plautius were enjoyed that day (even the first of July) on which they began their office, to agree and part between themselves their Provinces. As for the month, wherein for the most part the assembly for election of Magistrates was holden, we read it was February; like as the thirteenth of March was ordinary for them to begin their government. For this day held alwaies, during the second Punic war and the Macedonian, and longer than so. Thus Livy testifieth in many places, which to quote is needless) as in the six book of the second Punic war, and in the beginning of the first book as touching the Macedonian. By which, who seeth nor that there is great variety in the month and day both, whereupon the Magistrates were wont to begin their rule? But whereas all the certainty in computation and account of the time dependeth upon a precise, exact, firm, and settled reckoning of years, months, and dates; and seeing that in Livy's story it is neither expressly shewed, what year, month, or day, the Magistrates began their government, nor precisely noted when the reckoning altered; considering also that nothing therein is more wavering and inconstantly delivered, than the very usuall day of entrie into Magistracy: what marvel is there, if authors dissent so much about the computation of the times? whiles one beginneth at this month, another at that: whiles some, I say, ascribe these Magistrates created to this year, others attribute the same to another.

Thirdly, there being great difference between Dionysius and Livy, as well about the reckoning of the times and years, as the acts and affairs that therein passed; all seemeth to have risen hereupon, that the purpose of Livy was not to deliver exactly the acts and occurrents of greatest antiquity which hapned in the State of the people of Rome: and which by many writers aforetime had been most diligently set down and penned to posterity: but to record and write those things especially, which from the time a little before the second Punic war had been achieved by the people of Rome, unto the age wherein himself lived. But because (as Polybius most wisely and pitifully writeth) a generall story cannot be understood by particular registers: and for that an Historiographer study & endeavour ought to be employed rather in an universall treatise, than in particular discourses: therefore, left so great a piece of work as his, wanting a beginning, should seem maimed & imperfect; in the formost 20 books he slightly & briefly ran over the deeds of the people of Rome from the foundation of the City, unto the beginning of the second Punic war. But Dionysius professing purposely to describe the ancient monuments of the Romans, thought it his part to overpass and omit nothing worthy of remembrance, but most curiously and exactly hath delivered all things pertinent, either to the calculation of the times or discourse of affairs, in so much as those things whereof Livy hath scantily made 3 books, he hath declared at large in eleven. Hereupon, if a man read in Dionysius, the ancient beginning and original of the Roman Empire, and examine wel the times how they are by him digested & compare the same with the brevity in Livy, no doubt he will prefer the diligence of the former before the overhastiness of the later. But if the indifferent reader consider the purpose and intent of them both, he will yield unto either of them their due praise; & whereas Livy making haste to other matters, hath either let pass or more slightly handled some things, he will judge him worthy rather to be excused than reproved for it.

To these three causes above rehearsed, others also might be adjoynd; namely, the ordering of the years by Romulus, and the variety as touching that year wherein Rome was founded: but it may suffice only to touch these & point unto them with the finger. Howbeit, this we think good to advertise and admonish the reader by the way; that albeit in the digesting and reckoning of the Coss, we have let before our eyes to follow the marble tables and monuments of Verrinus Flaccus, and according thereunto have framed and applied the computation of the years: yet that year before the 250. as also the other, which Verrinus rejected, we have inserted with the rest, that our account might fall out just with the sum of the years, as they are collected by Varro. Which, before us, Onuphrius Panvinus a most learned man hath done in his Kalender, thinking that the year which Verrinus and they that followed him rased out was the 423. and therefore he hath put it to the rest without Consuls, according to the Capitoline records.

Of the computation of times usually observed by the Romans, and of the year of the Cities foundation.

THe calculation of years was taken and observed by men in old time divers and sundry waies. The Achæans (as we read) received it from the revolution of the stars: the Argives from their women Priests: as for example, if Chrysis such a year were chief Priest to offer sacrifices, they counted the number of years from the said Chrysis. But many have derived and fetched the course and consequence of their acts and affairs, from the years before Troy was built, or else after the winning thereof. Howbeit, from the 408 year after the captivity thereof, by occasion of the Olympian games, which Hercules first instituted in the honour of his great grandfire by the mothers side, and which by his son Iphiclus (or Iphitus, as some will have it) were renewed that year from that time (I say) they began to number the years by the Olympiads, especially among the Grecians, whose story (as Ensebius affirmeth) is not of any credit but from the time of the first Olympias. The Hebrews (like as other nations in the East) received the denomination and reckoning of the years from their KK. The Athenians, from their Eponymi (as they called them) but that in their Archæresia, [that is, the election of their Magistrates] which were wont to hold for certain daies about the beginning of the year, they counted in this wise, ἐν ἀρχῇ ἀγορεύουσιν ἐν ἀρχῇ ἀγορεύουσιν, i. e. the tenth or eleventh of the first Prytania. And hereof it seemeth, that the name cometh τῷ ἀγορεύουσιν; as it from thence, their acts received both the time and also the name. After the example of the Athenians and others, the Romans reckoned their daies, made their Kalender, and registred their acts by such and such Consuls: noting thereto otherwhiles the year from the Cities foundation. But about it there is much more diversity in authors, than about that wherein the first Consuls took their government. And seeing the clearing and declaration of that point is not impertinent to this place, briefly we will rehearse the opinions of authors as touching the time when the City of Rome was founded.

To begin therefore at them, who (according to the common received opinion of others) have written longer ago and further off, Timæus Siculus (I know not upon what reason induced) hath recorded, how the City was built by Romulus much about the time that Carthage in Africa by the Tyrians, namely, in the 38 year before the first Olympias.

L. Cincius (a Senator of Rome by calling) saith it was in the fourth year of the twelfth Olympias. Q. Fabius Pictor (a most ancient writer of the Roman story and of greatest credit) attributeth it to the first year of the eighth Olympias.

Polybius Megapolitanus, and Diodorus Siculus, quote the second year of the 7 Olympias. Appollodorus, Q. Lutatius Catulus, C. Cornelius Nepos, Eratosthenes, M. Porcius Cato, Dionysius Halicarnassæus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, name the first year of the 7 Olympias.

M. Verrinus Flaccus, (the voucher of the Capitoline Rome-records) T. Livius, C. Julius Solinus, Clæmus Alexandrinus, and others, will have it to be the fourth year of the 6 Olympias.

L. Taruntinus

L. Taruntius Firmianus, M. Terentius Vatro, T. Pomponius Atticus, M. Tullius Cicero, Augustus Caesar, C. Plinius Secundus, Plutarchus Charonianus, Domitianus Caesar Augustus, P. Cornel. Tacitus, Cassius Dio, A. Gellius, L. Septimius Severus Augustus, Censorinus, M. Julius Philippus Augustus, Eusebius Pamphilus, Casariensis, Eutropius, Paulus Orosius, Paulus Diaconus Longobardus: and after the time of C. Caesar Dictator, the common opinion of the people of Rome (which we also go by) will have the City to be founded the third year of the sixt Olympias.

But by what motives and reasons each one of these authors is induced, & whereby they would seem to confirm their severall opinions, needles it is in this place for to declare: both because the speculation hereof pertaineth properly to another profession, and also for that (besides Plutarch in Romulus, Solinus in the 1. chapter of his Polyhistor, and Camerus in his annotation thereupon) the question hath been so thoroughly handled by Onuphrius Panvinus in the first book of his Calender, that the thing requireth no further examination.

Now for the day on which the foundation of the City of Rome was laid by Romulus, it was the eleventh day before the Calends of May, called Parilia or Palilia. Now was this a festival day to Pales the goddess of shepherds, celebrated by the said shepherds upon the eleventh Calends of May, in the fields and country villages, for the chasing away of wolves, for the preservation of their sheep and cattell from diseases, or for the safe yeanning and bringing forth their young: whereupon they were called Parilia. Of this matter writeth Propertius in his fourth book, in this wise:

A feast there was, Palilia, our fathers did it call,

And on that day they first began, for Rome to build a wall.

Ovid also in the fourth book of his Fasts:

A time full meet they chose, with pough the plot to mark,

Dame Pales was hand, and so began the work.

The same is avouched by M. Tullius, Plutarch, Solinus and others. And that these Palilia were solemnized ordinarily the eleventh day before the Calends of May, appeareth as well by the old marble Calenders, as also by the same authors before rehearsed.

Of the first sovereign Magistrates of the City of Rome, namely, of the KK, who were in number seven.

ALl sorts of policies and governments in a Common-weal which are set down and named by ancient Writers, the City of Rome (were it by the fatal course of destiny, or upon some troubles in the State) hath received and endured every one: so as no Common-weal in manner there can be found, wherein they succeeded so one after another, as they did in the very City of Rome. For in the beginning, the KK ruled it; but when they for their excessive outrage, and inordinate lust exercised upon their Citizens and subjects, were deposed and expelled, the Coss. (and after them the Tribunes military in Coss. authority) held the sovereignty. But in process of time, when this frame and form of Common-weal (simply the best) was by the outrage of the two Gracchi (Saturninus and Drusus Tribunes of the Commons) put out of joynt and troubled, untill such time as their power and authority was by Sylla rent in twain, and the Commons disseized of their lands and killed: then the administration of the Common-weal was restored again to the Nobles and principal persons of the City. But at length, when it was oppressed again by the civill war of Pompey and Caesar, the sovereign rule of the State was devolved upon the Empire of Caesar alone: wherein, being first shaken a few years before, through the wicked infolency and lust of the three Triumvirs, it continued untill the time that it fell to utter ruin. We therefore will briefly go through all these sorts of governments, in that successive order as they followed one after another, and first begin with the KK.

R*omulus*, the founder of the City, reigned 37 years: for so many Livy assigneth unto him. Likewise Dionysius in the first book, which he repeateth also in the second: and Plutarch in Numa dissenteth not from them, howsoever in Romulus, he writeth, that he departed this world in the 37 year of his age. Solinus in like manner rehearsing his worthy acts, attributeth unto his reign 37 years. Only Eutropius (1. book 4. chap.) alloweth unto him 39 years: but Cassius thinketh very well that the Copy is corrupt. This Prince having reigned (according to the more common received opinion of authors) 37 years; in which time, he laid the first ground-work of the Roman Empire, with excellent laws and ordinances, and established both civill and also military discipline, departed this life upon the Nones of July, which day was called afterwards, Nonæ Caprotinæ: by occasion that he in mustering and reviewing his army at the lake of Capra, was conveyed out of mens sight: whereupon the people fled as amazed at the sudden death of their King; as Plutarch & Dionysius do witness. This Romulus after his deification was named Quirinus, of these reasons.

Or els the Cures, whom he brought with Romans for to live.

That he was base born, and could not avouch his own father, beside other writers, Plutarch especially affirmeth in his Theseus. Howbeit, the old opinion went currant, that he was by Mars begot in stealth of a vestall virgin, Ilia, Rhea, or Sylvia, for so many names there go of her: and that first he was called Romus, of Ruma, which signifieth a teat or pap, and afterwards by way of flattery, Romulus.

I

Interregents.

FOR one year after the death of Romulus the nobles fell to variance & strove who should be K, but by reason, that no one person excelled above the rest in that state so newly founded, there grew severall factions & debates in their head-corporations. They who were descended from the Sabins (because after the death of Tartius none of them reigned with Romulus in equall society) were desirous to have a K, created out of their body, because they would not forgo their hold and possession in the Empire.
But the old Romans could not away with a stranger King. Howbeit, as different as they were in affections, all were willing to set up a K, as having not tasted yet the sweetness of liberty. The Peers moreover mightily feared (by reason that the neighbour States bordering round about were provoked against them) lest some forraign force might assail their City lest thus without sovereign government, and the army without a leader. Whereupon the two hundred Nobles agreed among themselves to enter into an association of rule, and made ten Decuries:
and in every Decury created one to have the soverignty over the rest. These Senators were then 100 in number, as Livy saith, and according to Plutarch a hundred and fifty. But Dionysius writeth, that there were two hundred of the Sabins & as many Romans. After this they cast lots: and their Decury unto whom the lottery first fell ruled the City: howbeit, not all of them at once, but one alone had the regall ornaments, and the Lictors going before him.
Five daies he governed and no longer: and so by this order in course the nobles of every Decury governed the City fifty daies. For after five daies determined, he whose lot was first to govern in that Decury, delivered up unto the second the imperiall dignity together with the ensigns thereof: and he again, when his five daies were expired, unto a third, and so to the tenth. Thus when these ten first Interregents had passed one 50 daies a second Decury of Senators in like manner ruled the City other 50 daies; and thus they went round through all untill they had fulfilled a years space in this regency. This government was of the thing it self called Interregnum, which name it still retained afterwards, and the men likewise were named Interreges. In this year therefore was the Magistracy of the Interregents first devised among the Romans. And not only after the death of Romulus the State was ruled by Interregency, but also after the decease of Numa, Tullius, and Anius Kings. In like manner during the time of the free State and Common-weal, after the time of yearly Magistrates expired, the said government took place very often before the creation of new: for they held the assembly for elections, wherein new governors were by the people created. Now the office and charge of this Interregent was, during the time of his regency (which ordinarily passed not five daies) to execute all those functions in the City which belonged either to KK, or Coss, namely, to minister justice, to rule the Common-weal, to hold a Senat, and there to propound the affairs of State, and lastly, to summon the generall assembly for choosing new Magistrates. As touching the beginning of Interregents, Dionysius in his second book, Livy in his first, Plutarch in Numa, Sext. Rufus, Eusebius and other old writers, have written at large.

Numa Pompilius the second K. reigned 43 years.

ONE year of Interregency being thus accomplished, the people of Rome thought this grievous and heavy manner of government; and the Commons grumbled that their servitude was manifold more than before, as having two hundred Lords over them instead of one. Which when the Senators perceived, they agreed at last upon this point, That the old Senators should create a King, whom they would, so he were not one of their own body and degree. Whereupon Numa Pompilius (for that in justice & wisdom he excelled all other) was called out of Cures, a City of the Sabins, to be their King. That he reigned three and forty years, all accord, save Entropius, Eusebius, and Cassiodorus (late writers) who let down but one and forty, as Onasphrius and Sigonius have observed. Of this K. Dionysius in the second book, Livy in his first, Solinus in his second chapter, Plutarch, Pliny, and Entropius in his life; in like sort, Valerius Maximus have delivered much in record. He died not much above the age of 80 years, as Plutarch writeth; for born he was (as he testifieth) the same day whereon Romulus laid the first foundation of the City, namely, the twelfth Calends of May. Now for the name of Numa, some say it was the forename of Pompilius. But out of Sextus Pompeius it appeareth, that neither Tullius nor Numa were fore-names, as also by this conjecture, for that the sons of Numa are by Dionysius called by other sundry names, divers from the family. Some thought therefore that Numa, Anius, Arant, Volusus, Drusus, Fanstus, Julus, Manimurinus, and certain other surnames, were at first forenames, as Mark-anne in his Annals hath very well so-ted.

T. Quintus Capitolinus N. Publius

Not only Levy, but Cassiodorus also recordeth that the Cons. this year were N. Fabius Valens and T. Quinctius Capitolinus. Diodorus over-passed them; but so do up the Sicilian registers. In a fragment of the Capitol marbles, we find engraven T. Quinctius Capitolinus Barbatus and N. Fabius. This Fabius was the son of Q. Fabius the Decemvir, who after the 300 Fabii slain in Corbora; survived and was the first of all that kindred and family surname Nummici; as Valerius Maximus in his 6th book, and Sen. Pompeius do report. As for T. Quinctius no Quintus in Levy writeth; so that Capitolinus who was Consul six times.

When the greater part of the year was spent in troubles and contentions, between the new Trib. of the Commons and certain Interregents, while the Tribunes one while would not suffer the Patricii to go together about the declaring of an interregent, and another while impeached the Interregent that he could not possesse enact of the Spain for the election of Consuls in length L. Papirius Murgillanus the Interregent, by rebuking as well the Senators as the Tribunes of the Commons, prevailed, that an assembly should be holden for choosing of Tribunes consular. So there were created Tribunes military with Consuls authority, and all Patricii, T. Quinctius Cincinnatus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus, M. Manlius, L. Sempronius Atratinus. Thus much Livy.

M. Papirius Arvirgatus Consul
C. Servilius Priscus Consul

For Tribunes Consul this year, Livy nameth these. This C. Servilius, is by Verrinus named Arvirgatus. Diodorus calleth them L. Sergius, M. Servilius, and M. Papirius. Now this M. Papirius was son to L. Papirius Mugillanus the Censor.

337
Agrippa Memmius Lanius, L. Servilius Strabon,
P. Lucius Tricipitinus, Sp. Nesterius Crassus

All these are recorded by Livy, for Trib. military this year. Of these L. Servilius Strabon was the first time in the 332 year, but left out in Livy through fault of those that wrote the copies. Diodorus hath the same Tribune besides the surnames, and L. Servilius, whom he called Cainus. In a Capitoline table their names are thus cut P. Lucius son of Hostus, Agrippa Memmius son of T. nephew of Agrippa.

338

A. Sempronius Atratinus III
Sp. Nautius Rutilius II.

Papirius Mugillanus

Only these are by Livy recorded: but that the pen-men who wrote out the books left out the fourth Tribune of this year Quintus Fabius son of Quintus nephew of Marcus (named also Arvirgatus) the Capitol stones and Diodorus do testify. Livy himself also doth shew the same, who writeth that Quintus Fabius was Tribune military the second time, in the year three hundred and forty: but in what year he was first, it appeareth not. Moreover, A. Sempronius is by Verrinus named the son of Lucius and nephew of Anlus. Diodorus reckoneth all four, but he concealeth their surnames.

339

P. Cornelius Cossus, Q. Cincinnatus
C. Valerius Potius, N. Fabius Vibulanus

These doth Livy deliver unto us for Tribunes military in Consuls authority. Diodorus in this wise, P. Cornelius, Cainus, Q. Fabius. The table of the Capitol thus, P. Cornelius, F. nephew of P. C. Valerius, son of L. nephew of Volusus, the forename of Quintus is unknown.

340

Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Potius,
Q. Fabius Vibulanus II. Posthumius Regillensis

These declareth Livy for this year: but Diodorus, Titus Posthumius, Quintus Cornelius, C. Valerius, and Cato Fabius. But Verrinus Flaccus nameth P. Posthumius son of A. nephew also of Anlus; whom Livy writeth to have been stoned to death by his own army for his cruelty.

Q. Cornelius Cossus, C. Furius Medullinus

Then the Nobles and Livy of the Senate reported; that there should be Consuls created in the Centuriat assembly, which Q. Fabius held. And the Consuls were M. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus. The surnames are named by Diodorus, and Cassiodorus, but that they leave out their surnames. The Greek records have Cossus and Medullinus.

Q. Fabius Ambustus, C. Furius Pacifer

Livy and Cassiodorus name these for Consuls; Diodorus, suppresseth their surnames.

M. Papirius, C. Nautius Rutilius

Both Livy and Cassiodorus report for this year Consuls, M. Papirius and C. Nautius Rutilius. Diodorus hath not a word for the surnames. Cassiodorus book setteth them down by the surnames only Mugillanus and Rutilius.

M. Emilius, C. Valerius

Livy and Cassiodorus call these Consuls, M. Emilius and C. Valerius. Diodorus in stead of M. hath M. M. Maximus. This Emilius in the table of the Capitol, named in his first and third Tribuneship, M. Baebius son of Manius, nephew of M. and surname Manius.

Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Furius Medullinus

Livy putteth these down for the Consuls of this year. Cassiodorus passeth over their surnames and the numeral note of two. Diodorus hath L. Furius and Cn. Pompeius, but he is to be written Cn. Cornelius, out of the end of a broken fragment in the Capitol; and the other L. Furius, by his Tribuneship, testified in the Capitol records.

C. Julius Julius, Tribune militaria
P. Cornelius Cossus, Cin Consuls authority
C. Servilius Ahala, Scy.

These are set down for Tribunes military this year by T. Livius. Diodorus saith nothing of their surnames, which the Capitoline tables exhibit unto us. C. Servilius is written in the second Tribuneship (after the Capitol records) the son of Pub. and nephew of Q. (named Ahala).

L. Furius Medullinus II. C. Valerius Potius II.
N. Fabius Vibulanus II. C. Servilius Ahala II.

Livy

Livy reporteth, that the four Tribunes consular were all Patritii this year, & had born that dignity once before, to wit, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, N. Fabius Vibulanus and C. Servilius Ahala; and then this man last named was chosen again and continued in his place still this year with the former, as well in regard of other vertues as for the fresh favour and late grace gotten by his singular moderation and rare carriage in his government. Diodorus hath C. Furius, C. Servilius, C. Valerius, and N. Fabius. In the Capitoline tables, two are written short, Potitus & Valerius II and Medullinus, the other two at full; whereby it doth appear (as Onuphrius reporteth that Livy was deceived. For Medullinus was not this year Tribune the second time, but the first: who had been twice Consul before, and after this year, will be no lesse then seven times Tribune military.

348

P. Cornelius Cossus. N. Fabius Ambustus.
Cn. Cornelius Cossus. L. Valerius Potitus.

Of these four Tribunes military, L. Valerius Potitus and N. Fabius Ambustus stand upon record in the Capitoline tables; the other two, as appeareth by a fragment thereof, by Livy also and Cassiodorus, were Pub. Cornelius, son of Anulus, nephew of M. Rutilius Cossus, so written by his dictatorship. Diodorus reckoneth T. Terentius Maximus for the fourth Tribune.

T. Quintius Capitolinus. A. Manlius.
Q. Quintius Cincinnatus. L. Furius Medullinus III
C. Iulius Iulus. II. M. Aemilius Mamercus.

Diodorus saith, that this year six Tribunes were created, but he nameth but three, T. Quintius Capitolinus, C. Iulius, and An. Manlius. Livy rehearseth them all as here they be set down. The Capitoline stone hath Iulus. II. Capitolinus Barbatus, Cincinnatus, and the other three. And this was the first year that had six Tribunes military, notwithstanding that the law permitted it before, at what time as first it was granted that Tribunes should be created: and in this year began the siege first before Veii.

C. Valerius Potitus. III. Cn. Cornelius Cossus.
M. Sergius Fidenas. K. Fabius Ambustus.
P. Cornelius Maluginensis. Sp. Nautius Rutilus. II

The same Tribunes that Livy nameth, Diodorus also rehearseth, but that he leaveth out the surnames, and corruptly calleth Cn. Cornelius by the name of Junius Lucullus. In the Capitoline stones they are written, Maluginensis, Cossus, II. Ambustus; and the other three fully out. Nautius Rutilus Livy nameth the second time, but Verrius Flaccus the third time.

M. Aemilius Mamercus. II. M. Quintius Varus
L. Valerius Potitus. III. L. Iulius Iulus.
App. Claudius Crassus. M. Posthumius.
M. Furius Camillus. M. Posthumius Albinus.

Livy writeth that the number of Tribunes military were by the Romans augmented, and eight of them created, which were more then ever any time before, whose names we have set down. In Diodorus they are thus named, Manius Claudius, Mar. Quintilius, Lu. Iulius, M. Furius, L. Valerius. And albeit there be wanting in him some Tribunes, yet Onuphrius thinketh, and so doth Sigonius, that himself by his own writing delivered not eight, but six: which Verrius Flaccus also observed in the Capitoline tables.

C. Servilius Ahala. III. Q. Sulpitius.
Q. Servilius. A. Manlius.
L. Virginus. M. Sergius. II.

IN Livy the Tribunes military in Consuls authority are C. Servilius Ahala the third time Quin. Servilius, and Lu. Virginus; the rest as in the tables of the Capitol, but only the forenames. Livy nameth Qu. Servilius Fidenas in the other six Tribunships following, which he shall bear. To Lucius Virginus, Onuphrius addeth Tricostrus, a surname usually in that house. Diodorus squarseth not out of this range, but as Sigonius noteth, he doth fault in the name, κλαυδίου μενέστρατος. In the fragment of the Capitol, they are thus named, Q. Sulpitius the son of Servius, N. Camerinus Cornanius, An. Manlius, son of Anulus, nephew of C. Volsus Capitolinus the second time, M. Sergius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, surnamed Fidenas, the second time,

353

L. Valerius Potitus. IV. Cn. Cornelius Cossus.
M. Furius Camillus. K. Fabius Ambustus.
M. Aem. Mamercinus. III. L. Iulius Iulus.

Livy reckoneth all these Tribunes this year. Diodorus putteth down Lu. Iulius, M. Furius, Aemilius Mamercus, Cains Cornelius Cossus, K. Fabius surnamed victorios, but amisse. In the fragments of the Capitol, they are thus named, Lucius Iulius son of Lucius, nephew of Vopiscus surnamed Iulus. Marcus Aemilius, son of Manius, nephew of Mar. Mamercus. K. Fabius son of Marcus, nephew of Qu. Ambustus the second time. These were commanded to enter into government upon the first day of October (whereas the thirteenth of December was the usual day beforetime) by reason of an overthrow received the former year at Veii by M. Sergius Camillus made an expedition in the Faliscians countrey, Cornelius to the Capenates, Valerius to the Volscians for the recovery of Anagnin, Aemilius and Fabius to besiege Veii.

P. Licinius Calvus. P. Manius.
T. Titinius. P. Malius.
L. Furius Medullinus. L. Publius Valsus.

THele by T. Livius are this year named the Tribunes military. But Diodorus rehearseth only three, namely, P. Melius, Sp. Manius, and L. Furius. But Onuphrius thinketh that he is to be read, not L. Furius but Sp. Furius. The same author hath put to P. Licinius, the surname of Calvus, whom Livy writeth to have been the first man of the commonalty chosen Tribune military, only to take possession of the said right and interest.

M. Veturius. M. Pomponius.
C. Duilius. Volero Publilius.
Cn. Genucius. L. Atilius.

THele Diodorus sheweth for Tribunes. But Livy letteth down Marcus Veturius to have been the only Patritian, and the rest commoners, namely, M. Pomponius, C. Duilius, Volero Publilius, Cn. Genucius, L. Atilius, Cuspinian his book, who every year delivereth the names only of two Tribunes, hath Angurinus and Longus, surnames of Genucius & Atilius.

L. Valerius Potitus. V. L. Furius Medullinus.
M. Valerius Max. Q. Servilius Fidenus. II.
M. Furius Camillus. II. Q. Sulpitius Camerinus.

Al these Tribunes military for this year created were Patritii, as Livy writeth: neither differeth Diodorus although he recite two names corruptly, to wit, κλαυδιος υγιων & χρυσιδιος αππιος. Plutarch in the life of Camillus maketh mention, of the said Camillus, the second time Tribune military; and the Capitoline Stone of Medullinus the third time.

L. Julius Iulus. A. Posth. Regillensis.
L. Furius Medullinus. IV. P. Cor. Maluginensis.

In this wise Livy reckoneth them, but Diodorus L. Sergius, A. Posthumius, P. Cornelius σεξτον λευσιον, Q. Manlius αγυριον καμινδν. But in those two Greek-written names, as Sigonius & Onuphrius, observeth there is a foul error.

P. Licinius. P. F. Calvus. L. Titinius. II.
P. Manius. II. P. Melius. II.
Cn. Genucius. II. L. Atilius. II.

IN this manner are these Tribunes military delivered us unto by Livy. But Diodorus names them thus, L. Titinius, P. Licinius, P. Malius, Q. Manius, Cn. Genucius, and L. Atilius. All these, but L. Licinius the son of Publius (as Livy saith) bare the dignity of Tribuneship a little before: who writeth moreover, that Genucius was slain in a battle against the Faliscians.

P. Cornelius Cossus. P. Cornelius Scipio.
L. Fabius Ambustus. IV. L. Furius Medullinus. IV.
M. Valerius Max. II. Q. Servilius. III.

After the winning of Vesii, this year had for Tribunes military in Consuls authority, those above-named: Diodorus calleth P. and Ser. Cornelius both, Cossi: in the rest, saving that he concealeth their surnames, he agreeth.

L. Furius Medullinus. VI. Sp. Posthumius.
L. Valerius Poplicola. M. Furius Camillus.

Livy nameth these in this year. Diodorus, M. Furius Aemilius, κατλον βιγον, but Camillus now is the third time. Sigonius and Onuphrius think, that by P. Cornelius we must understand Scipio, and not Cossus. This year Camillus Tribune military, by his just dealing reduced the Faliscians to the obedience of the people of Rome; in that he sent back unto them, that schoolmaster who betrayed their children: as Livy and Plutarch write. Valerius (not without some suspicion of error) writeth in his sixth book, that Camillus did this being Consul: whereas Plutarch saith, he was never Consul.

L. Lucretius Flavius. Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus.
After fifteen years (saith Livy) Coss. were created again L. Lucretius Flavius, & Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus, Diodorus and Cassiodorus passe over the surnames. The Sicilian registers do shew, Flavius, and Camerinus.

L. Valerius Potitus. M. Manlius Capitolinus.
L named afterwards Capitolinus, are by Livy reported Consuls this year. Dionysius in his first book maketh mention of these Consuls, naming them L. Valerius Potitus, and T. Manlius Capitolinus. Cassiodorus delivereth them by the names of L. Valerius and M. Manlius. Diodorus, of L. Valerius and A. Manlius: but the Sicilian registers, of Potitus and Capitolinus.

L. Lucretius. L. Furius Medullinus. VII.
Serv. Sulpitius. Agrippa Furius.
M. Aemilius. C. Aemilius. II.

By occasion that the Coss. lay sick, though good it was, to renew the government by means of an interregency: therefore after they had deposed the Coss. by an act of the Senate, six Trib. military were created with Consular authority, by the Interregent: who upon the first day of July began their magistracy, as Livy saith. Diodorus mentioneth but four, namely, L. Lucretius, Serv. Sulpitius, C. Aemilius, and L. Furius. As for Sulpitius, Zonaras calleth him Rufus; which surname Onuphrius also hath put unto him.

364
Q. Fabius Ambustus, Q. Sulpicius Longus,
 The brethren of Q. Servilius IIII.
Fabius Ambustus, Servilius Cor. Maluginensis

These are by T. Livius recorded for Tribunes military in Consuls authority: but Diodorus reckoneth the three Fabii, Q. Kic & C. and the other three, besides Plutarch in Camillus, Gellius out of Verrinus Flaccus, in his 5 book and 17 chapter; Macrobius also in his first book of Saturnalia, make report of Quintus Sulpicius a Tribune military.

365
L. Valerius Poplicola II, A. Manlius,
L. Virginus, L. Aemilius,
P. Cornelius, L. Posthumus.

According to Livy, these were created Tribunes military after the winning of the City: but by Diodorus, they were Pub. Cornelius, L. Virginus, Valerius, A. Manlius, and L. Posthumus. Of these Tribunes, Macrobius speaketh in his first book of Saturnalia.

366
T. Quintus Cincinnatus, L. Aquilius Corvus, Q. Servilius Fidenas V, L. Lucet. Tricipitinus,
L. Julius Iulus, Ser. Sulpicius Rufus.

367
L. Papirius, C. Sergius,
L. Aemilius II, C. Cornelius,
L. Menenius, L. Valerius Poplicola III.

These, Livy reporteth for Tribunes military in Consuls authority this year. But Diodorus hath L. Papirius, C. Cornelius, L. Menenius, C. Servilius, A. Valerius, and Q. Fabius. Howbeit, there is wanting in Livy the name of the fix Tribune, whom (out of Diodorus) Sigonius and Onuphrius have set to the rest, by the name of C. Cornelius. Diodorus also for Sergius hath Servilius, and Aemilius for Fabius.

368
M. Furius Camillus, L. Horatius Pulvillus,
S. Corn. Maluginensis, L. Quint. Cincinnatus,
Q. Servil. Fidenas VI, P. Valerius.

The Common-weal came to be governed again by Camillus, a Tribune military in Cons. authority, and for Collegues were added unto him these 5 here named. But Diodorus saith there were 4 created, M. Cornelius, Q. Servilius, M. Furius, and L. Quintus. In this year, when the Dictatorship was offered unto Camillus, he said there was no need thereof: and he, together with the Tribunes his Collegues, vanquished the Volscians, Antiots, & Tuscans which rebelled.

369
A. Manlius, P. Cornelius,
L. Quintus Capitolinus, L. Papirius Cursor II,
T. Quintus Capitolinus, C. Sergius II.

These hath Livy: but Diodorus saith, that four only were created, namely, L. Papirius, Q. T. and L. all Quintii. But of those six, A. Manlius having been Tribune military in the year 365, and who shall be a third time in the year 375, must now verily be the second time.

370
S. Corn. Maluginen. IV, P. Valerius Potitus II,
M. Furius Camillus V, Ser. Sulpicius Rufus II,
C. Papirius Crassus, T. Quint. Cincinnatus II.

These Tribunes military in Cons. authority, in this manner be delivered unto us by Livy: but Diodorus (as his manner is) putteth down four: Serv. Sulpicius, L. Papirius, Mar. Cornelius, and T. Quintus. In this year, M. Manlius attainted and condemned for aspiring to be K. was thrown down headlong from the rock Tarpeia: Liv. Plutarch, and Valer.

L. Valerius IV, L. Lucetius,
A. Manlius III, L. Aemilius, Ser. Sulpicius III, M. Tribonius.

Livy rangeth these in this year, Diodorus nameth four: L. Valerius, Crispus, (which is the name of Tribonius) Au. Manlius, and Serv. Sulpicius. Crispus some call Flavus.

372
Sp. Papirius, Q. Servilius,
L. Papirius, C. Sulpicius,
Ser. Cornelius IV, L. Aemilius IV.

According to Livy, these were created Tribunes military in Consuls authority. The surname of Cornelius (as we saw before) was Maluginensis. Diodorus writeth four: Q. Servilius, Sp. Papirius, Cornelius, & Sp. A., but not truly.

373
M. Furius Camillus VI, L. Furius,
A. Posthumus Regillensis, L. Lucetius,
L. Posthumus Regillensis, M. Fabius Ambustus.

Livy nameth these as we have placed them: but Diodorus in this wise; M. and L. both Furii, A. Posthumus, L. Lucetius, M. Fabius, and L. Posthumus. Plutarch also nameth Camillus Tribune military this year, wherein he vanquished the Preneestins, the Volscians, and the Tusculans also, against whom war was proclaimed, because they had served in the field under the Preneestins.

374
L. Valerius V, L. Menenius II,
L. Valerius III, P. Papirius,
C. Sergius III, Ser. Corn. Maluginensis.

These six are set down by Livy; but Diodorus reckoneth eight, namely, L. and P. both Valerius, C. Terentius, L. Menenius, C. Sulpitius, T. Papirius, L. Emilius, M. Fabius.

P. Manlius.

C. Sextilius.

C. Manlius.

M. Albinus.

L. Antistius.

After this, was the generall assembly holden for the election of military Tribunes in Consuls authority, wherein were as many created of the Commons as of the Patritii; namely, P. and C. both Manlii, with L. Julius, Patritians: and out of the Commons, C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antistius. But Diodorus exhibiteth eight, and so these above rehearsed, he addeth C. Herennius, and P. Trebonius. Sextilius also he calleth Sextius.

376.

S. Furius.

P. Clodius.

Q. Servilius P.

M. Horatius.

C. Licinius.

L. Geganus.

Livy reporteth these for Tribunes military in Consuls authority this year: but in Livy, for L. Menenius the third time, you must read C. Licinius, as Sigonius hath shewed in his Scholia upon Livy: which Onuphrius also in his Kalendar approveth. But Diodorus speaketh of no more than four: Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, L. Furius, P. Clodius.

L. Emilius.

Ser. Sulpitius.

P. Valerius IV.

L. Quintus Cincinnatus.

C. Veturius.

C. Quintus Cincinnatus.

These Tribunes military, the Consuls (being forced by the might and strong hand of the great men of the City) chose all Patritians, as Livy witnesseth. The same also are named by Diodorus excepting only C. Quintus who is called by him C. Cornelius. As for Ser. Sulpitius he was surnamed Prætextatus. Zonaras nameth him Rufus.

378. 379. 380. 381. 382.

C. Licinius Stolo.

S. Tribunes of the Commons five years.

In this year hapned the fourth change of the Roman government: for the administration of the weal publike, fell from Tribunes military in consuls authority, to the Tribunes of the commons. The authors that procured this mutation, were (as Livy reporteth) C. Licinius Stolo and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the commons, who in the former year having promulged three laws in favour of the commons and against the power of the Patritii, the first for redressing of debts; a second for a stint of lands and possessions; & the third, that there should be no more elections of Tribunes military and that one of the consuls should necessarily be chosen a commoner: seeing they could not go through with these laws, by reason of their own fellows oppositions (whom of purpose the Nobles had made for themselves) fell into anger, and would suffer no more Magistrates of State to be created, nor any elections to be holden, but only of Ediles and Tribunes, both of commons. This desolate estate, and want of Magistrates (whiles the commons made the same Tribunes still, who with incessant and invincible persistence never gave over to cross the election of Tribunes military) continued in the city for the space of five years, as Livy saith. This want of Magistrates, Diodorus calleth anarchy, and casteth it upon the former year. But Sext. Rufus, Entropius, Cassiodorus, and Zonaras write that they ruled the state not five years, but four only. Sigonius and Onuphrius in his Kalendar, follow Livy & his Annals seemeth that the capitoline writers go by. Pliny also in the sixteenth book, and four and fortieth chapter, maketh mention of the year three hundred seventy nine from the foundation of the city, in which year he saith that at Rome

When C. Licinius and L. Sextius the Tribunes gave over their opposition and the liberty of their negative voice, whereby the Interregent called and held an assembly for the election of Magistrates, the abovenamed Tribunes military, were (as Livy saith) created for this year. Diodorus nameth them thus, L. Papirius, L. Menenius, Ser. Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpitius, who writeth also, that after them there was another Anarchy, and when that was overpast and gone, then were created A. Manlius, L. Furius, Ser. Sulpitius, and Ser. Cornelius. But in his story, as well through his own default, as the negligence of the writers that copied out same, there is a confusion of yearly Magistrates.

This year also, as Livy writeth, had these for Tribunes military in Consuls authority. But Diodorus hath Q. Servilius, C. Veturius, A. Cornelius, M. Cornelius, and M. Fabius: as for Quintus, Sigonius calleth him rather Cincinnatus than Capitolinus. The rest have their warrant out of the Capitoline fragments, wherein it is thus found Cossus . . . Maluginensis . . . Cincinnatus . . . M. Fabius Ambustus. This is that M. Fabius Ambustus, who had bestowed his two daughters in marriage, the one to C. Licinius Stolo, the other to Ser. Sulpitius Prætextatus; as Livy writeth.

Serv. Sulpicius
L. Papirius

Sen. Cornelius
Sp. Servilius
L. Titinius

Livy declared these six for Tribunes military this year. Dionysius saith but three, namely, T. Quinctius, Servilius Cornelius, and Servius Sulpicius. What surnames all these carried, and with what numerall notes (signifying how often they had born the office) they are to be marked, the Capitoline fragments do shew; wherein they stand thus, Capitolinus; . . . Maluginensis, . . . Prætextatus, . . . Sp. Servilius Struatus, L. Papirius Crassus, L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.

Two Dictators without any curule Magistrats of State besides.

Presently in the very beginning of the year, they proceeded to put it to the trial of a final issue, what should become of the foresaid laws proposed by Licinius and Sextius. When the tribes were called to give their voices, and the publishers of the laws were not hindered by the negatives of their Colleagues coming between; the Nobles began then to quake for fear, and in all haste betook them to their two last helps and means of refuge, the sovereign and absolute government, and the principal Citizen and greatest man of all others. Resolve they did to nominate a Dictator, and Marcus Furius Camillus was the man; who took unto him for General of the horsemen L. Emilius. But when the Captains and ring-leaders of the Commons dealt very bitterly and roughly against Camillus he (as Livy writeth) resigned up his Dictatorship. Plutarch also testifieth the same: who liketh well avoucheth the cause thereof, which Livy goeth about to disprove. But both Livy and Plutarch do affirm, that in the room of Camillus thus giving over his place, there was a second Dictator created. Livy saith, it was P. Manlius. Plutarch suppresseth his name: but they agree both, that C. Licinius was the General of the horse. Howbeit they mean not both one and the self-same man. For Livy saith and that truly, that it was he who had been Tribune military in Consuls authority before: But Plutarch nameth him, who was the author of the sedition and of the new laws: wherein he faulteth. For the Captain of the foresaid sedition, was this year also made Tribune of the Com. and General of the horse at one time he could not be. And therefore Omnibrium thinketh him to have been the son of P. Licinius Calvus military Tribune, and who had to his grandfather that Pub. Licinius who of the Com. was the first Tribune military. Of this, see more in his Valerius.

A. Cornelius
L. Veturius
Julius P. Manlius

M. Cæcilius
M. Geganius
P. Valerius

Livy addith to these Trib. military before named for this year, whom Dionysius overpasseth. Their surnames, together with the notes signifying how often they had born this honourable dignity, are thus expressed in the Capitoline fragments, Cossus II. . . . Maluginensis II. . . . Macerinus, L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus II. . . . P. Valerius Petrus Poplicæ II. P. Manlius Capitolinus II.

388

When L. Sextius and C. Licinius Trib. of the Com. now chosen the tenth time, were more and more eager and instant in the publishing of their laws, in the end the authority both of Dictator and Senat, was conquered by the strong hand of the Tribunes. For they prevailed, notwithstanding all the Nobility was against it, that there should be holden a solemn assembly for election of Consuls: and that, (by vertue of their laws which they carried clear before them) the one of the Consuls should be a Commoner. By which meant, L. Sextius was the first Consul created from out of the Commons. But when the nobles denied flatly to approve the same by their assent, inasmuch as the Commons were at the point of insurrection and ready to leave the City: the discord & dissension was at length taken up and appealed by the mediation of the Dictator: and as the nobility was content to yield unto the commonalty a Consul, so the Commons granted unto the nobles one Pretor or Lord chief Justice within the City, and him to be created from out of the Nobility. Granted also unto them now first it was, that two Ediles Curule should be chosen out of the Patritii. The Commons conferred the Consulship upon D. Sextius (by whose law it was first obtained) and for companion in government he had L. Emilius Mamercus. Thus much Livy and Plutarch: who altogether with Cassiodorus put down for Cossus, L. Emilius a Patritius, and L. Sextius a Commoner. The same Dionysius nameth L. Emilius Mamercus, and L. Læteranus. Now this Læteranus is the surname of Sextius, as appeareth in a table of record in the Capitoll: wherein the consuls are thus to be seen, Mamercinus & L. Sextius Sextinus Læteranus: as also in the Sicilian registers they are called Mamercinus and Læteranus. In the book entituled De viris Illustribus of famous men, we find written that it was not L. Sextius, but C. Licinius Stolo, who was the first consul chosen out of the commonalty.

Diodorus, Livy, and Cassiodorus shew unto us for consuls, L. Genucius and Q. Servilius. Of whom Orosius also and Europius make mention. According to the records of the Capitoll the colon his first consulship is thus written, Q. Servilius son of Q. nepos of Quintus Abudus together together with L. Genucius, but in the second, the son of M. nephew of C. surnamed Amentinensis. In the Sicilian registers they be written Genucius and Corrinus; but corruptly, as Sigonius thinketh, C. Sulpitius Petrus, C. Licinius Stolo.

These be the Consuls reported by Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus concealeth their surnames. Valerius Maximus in his second book and first chapter maketh mention of them, and so doth Plutarch in his problems. But he whom all other writers name Stolo, the Capitoline records nominate Calvus; as also the Sicilian, which deliver their surnames Petrus and Calvus.

L. Aemilius Mamercus II., Cn. Genucius.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare these for Consuls: whom Diodorus in his sixteenth book nameth Cn. Genucius and L. Aemilius. In the Capitoline tables in this manner they be set down. Mamercinus II. and Cn. Genucius son of M. and nephew of M. Amentinensis. But in the Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and Stolo.

Q. Servilius Ahala II., L. Genucius II.

Diodorus nameth the Consuls of this year, Q. Servilius and Q. Genucius. The Sicilian registers, Ahala and Genucius. Livy and Cassiodorus, Q. Servilius Ahala and L. Genucius. These are they who three years before were matched together in the same government.

C. Sulpitius, C. Licinius Calvus.

These are by Livy recorded Consuls this year. Cassiodorus writeth them thus, C. Sulpitius II. and C. Licinius. Diodorus in this wise, C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius. Sigonius supposeth they be the same, who three years before were Collegues. The Sicilian registers give unto Licinius the surname, not of Calvus as before, but of Stolo; and Sulpitius they surname Petrus.

C. Petilius Libo, M. Fabius Ambustus.

Livy and Cassiodorus write the Consuls for this year were, C. Petilius Balbus and M. Fabius Ambustus. But Diodorus, M. Fabius and C. Petilius; corruptly for petilius. The Capitoline writers give them surnames divers from Livy: for they call Libo, Psulus; but he, Balbus. And the Sicilian registers go with those of the Capitoline.

M. Popilius Lanus, Cn. Manlius.

Livy and Cassiodorus name this year Consuls in this sort: but Diodorus collecteth them, M. Popilius Lanus, and Cn. Manlius Imperiosus. This was the first man of the Popilii, surnamed Lanus. The reason of which name Cassiodorus readeth in his book Byzantine, saying, M. Popilius being Consul, and at the same time offering sacrifice in his robe called Lana, for that he was Flamin to Carmenta, upon news brought unto him that the commons were up and risen in a commotion against the Nobles, came in that attire and habit as he was into the assembly; and what with his authority of countenance, and what with his eloquence of speech, appeased the sedition.

C. Fabius, C. Plautius.

Livy and Cassiodorus have these above-named for the Consuls this year: but in Diodorus they are named M. Fabius and C. Plautius. In the Capitoline records, Ambustus and C. Plautius Proculus.

C. Martius, Cn. Manlius.

Diodorus, Livy, and Cassiodorus name the Consuls of this year, C. Martius and Cn. Manlius. This Cn. Manlius was Consul the first time, two years before. Cassianus book and the Greek records have Rutilius and Capitolinus.

M. Fabius Ambustus II., M. Popilius Lanus II.

This years Consuls are with these names entitled by Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus leaveth out their surnames and the numerall notes. Cassianus book and the Greek records, set them thus down, Ambustus II. and Lanus.

C. Sulpitius Petrus III., M. Valerius Publicola.

In the four hundred year from the foundation of the City, and the thirty five after that it was by the Gauls won, the commons after eleven years did forgo their hold of the Consulship; and upon an Interregency, both Consuls of the Patres entered into government to wit, C. Sulpitius Petrus III. and M. Valerius Publicola, as Livy saith. The same Consuls Diodorus, Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers do report. But why the account of time made by Livy, disagreeeth from this reckoning, Sigonius and Onuphrius in his Calendar do give a reason.

M. Fab. Ambustus III., T. Quinctius, M. Popilius.

In this year also, according to Livy, both Consuls were Patres, namely, M. Fabius Ambustus the third time, with T. Quinctius; although he writeth, that in some Annals instead of T. Quinctius, he found Marcus Popilius Consul. With Livy accordeth Diodorus and Cassiodorus, Solinus also, who in his forty one chapter out of Cornelius Nepos writeth, that Alexander was born when M. Fabius Ambustus and T. Quinctius the Capitoline were Consuls. Cuspianus took seventh from Amulius and Capitolinus. But these Consuls and those that follow are in the Sicilian registers concealed.

C. Sulpitius Peticus, H. H. M. Valer. Poplicola III.

Both Consuls created this year were Patritius, and namely, those who are here set down, after Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus omit-teth both their surnames, and also the numeral notes, and setteth after the former Consuls, M.
Valerius and C. Sulpitius.

P. Valerius Poplicola, C. Martius Rutilus.

To L. Valerius Poplicola was given in fellowship of government this year, C. Mar-tius Rutilus of the commons, as Livy saith. These Cassiodorus calleth P. Valerius and C. Martius
Rutilus the second time, Diodorus nameth them
M. Fabius and P. Valerius. The Sicilian registers intermingle them confusedly with those of the next year, marching Rutilus and Pennus together.

C. Sulpit. Peticus. T. or K. or C. Quint. Pennus.

The Coss. for this year created were C. Sulpitius Peticus, and T. Quint. Pennus. Some put to Quintus the name Cajo, others Caius. Livy and Cassiodorus name them thus, C. Sulpitius Peticus, and T. Quintus Pennus: but Diodorus
C. Sulpitius and C. Quintus.

M. Popilius Lanus, L. Cornelius Scipio.

Livy writeth, that for Consuls this year the commons yielded M. Popilius Lanus, and the nobles L. Cornelius Scipio. Cassiodorus setteth them forth under the name of M. Popilius Lanus the third time, and L. Cornelius Scipio.
Diodorus nameth them, C. Cornelius and M. Po-pilius: and the Sicilian registers barely Scipio and Lanus.

L. Furius Camillus, P. Claudius Crassus.

L. Furius Camillus the Dictator restored the nobles again to their former possession of the Consulship: and being himself for that good demerit created Consul, with the great love and hearty affection of the nobles, nominated for his Colleague, Publius Claudius Crassus. Thus saith Livy. The same Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus. But Diodorus, nameth them Amylius and T. Quintus. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Crassus. Cicero in Cato maketh mention of these Consuls, saying, that Plato came to Tarentum, when L. Camillus and P. Claudius were Consuls. Livy likewise Book 11 chapter,

M. Valerius Corvus, M. Popilius Lanus, III.

M. Aulus Manlius being Dictator, declared for Consul with the exceeding favour of the people, M. Valerius Corvus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence, and being but three and twenty years old.
This Corvus had joyned with him in the Consulship from out of the commons, M. Popilius Lanus the third time, as saith Livy and Cassio-dorus. But Diodorus three years after nominateth M. Valerius and M. Popilius. In the fragment of the Capitoll thus only it is found, M. Valerius, M. P. M. N. Corvus Consul. In the Sicilian registers Corvinus and Lanus.

T. Manlius Torquatus, C. Plantius.

Livy and Cassiodorus nameth them for Corinians this year. Cuspianus Kalender and the Sicilian records, Torquatus and Vennio. In a fragment of the Capitoll there is to be read the surname of Manlius, Imperiosus Torquatus.

M. Valerius Corvus II, C. Patellius.

These are named Consuls by Livy, and Cas-siodorus: but Cuspianus Kalender and the registers of Sicily shew for Consuls, Corvinus and Libo. As for the name C. Patellius, it is described by his Dictatorship, which (according to the Capitoll evidences) he bare in the year 440: for in a fragment (testifying his Consul-ship) there appeareth no more but one of his surnames, Esulus.

409

M. Fabius Dorso, Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus.

These were the Consuls created for this year, as Livy and Cassiodorus write. Diodorus also (although not in the right place) alleageth M. Fabius and Ser. Sulpitius Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Dorso and Camerinus. Both these Consuls were Patritii, which Livy omitted.

C. Mart. Rutilus III, T. Manlius Torquatus II.

Livy and Cassiodorus avow these for Coss.
this year. Diodorus likewise delivereth unto us, C. Martius and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers, Rutilus and Torquatus. Frontinus also in his second book of Stratagemis speaketh of them.

M. Valerius Corvus III, A. Cornelius Cossus.

Livy and Cassiodorus both together report, that these were chosen Coss. for this year.
Diodorus, Cicero in his book of Divination, and Frontinus, nameth them, M. Valerius and A. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Valerius and Cossus:
both of them are Patritii. But he that hath written of famous men, calleth them, Valerius Mans, and Cornelius Cossus.

C. Marius Rutilus IV. Q. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare Coss. for this year, C. Marius and Q. Servilius. Diodorus, Q. Servilius and Marius Rutilus. The Sicilian registers, Abala and Rutilus. This is that Q. Servilius Abala who was Master of the horse in the 403 year.

C. Plantius II. L. Aemilius Mamercinus.

The Consuls that followed were C. Plantius the second time, and L. Aemilius Mamercinus, as witness Livy and Cassiodorus: but L. Aemilius & C. Plantius, as testifieth Diodorus and as the Sicilian registers say, Venno and Mamercinus. Cuspinian's Kalender set forth for this year, Venno the second time, and Mamercinus.

T. Manlius Torquatus III. P. Decius Mus.

Titus Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus, bare the Consulship this year, as Livy and Cassiodorus report. Diodorus nameth them, T. Manlius Torquatus and P. Decius. The Sicilian registers, Torquatus and Mus. Zonaras, Torquatus the third time, and Decius. Of the same Consuls Pliny speaketh in his 22 book and 5 chap. Valerius also in his 1 book and 5 chap. besides others.

T. Aemilius Mamercinus. Q. Publilius Philo.

Titus Aemilius Mamercinus, and Q. Publilius Philo, are by Livy reckoned Coss. for this year, Diodorus passeth over their surnames. The Greek records shew unto us, Mamercinus and Philo. As for Philo, he is described out of the tables of the Capitoll,

416

Thus say Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus hath L. Furius and Camillus, but corruptly The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Menius. The Capitoll monuments of triumphs, L. Furius Camillus, and C. Menius. Pliny in his 34 book and 5 cha. maketh mention of Caius Menius, Consul, 417

C. Sulpitius Longus. P. Elius Patus.

Livy and Cassiodorus write, that these Coss. followed. Diodorus putteth down C. Sulpitius, and L. Papirius. The Sicilian registers, have Longus and Patus.

418

L. Papirius Crassus. K. Dintius.

Lucius Papirius Crassus, and K. Dintius, were this years Coss. as witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and Diodorus also, but for leaving out the surname Crassus. In the Sicilian registers they are named, Crassus and Dintius. As touching these Consuls, Cicero in his Epistle to Plinius writeth thus, L. Papirius Crassus, four years after he was Dictator, was made Consul with K. Dintius.

M. Valerius Corvus III. M. Atilius Regulus.

This year, when the Aunones that inhabited the City Citer, took arms and combated with the Sidicins, M. Valerius Corvus, a right noble General, was created Consul the fourth time, having to his Collegis (as Livy writeth) M. Atilius Regulus. Cassiodorus likewise declareth the same for Consuls; and so doth Diodorus, but that he leaveth out their surnames: which appear extant in the Sicilian registers.

T. Veturius. Sp. Posthumius.

The Dictator held an assembly for the election of Consuls, wherein were created (according to Livy) these above-named. So say Cassiodorus also and Diodorus. Zonaras nameth them Tiber. Calvinus, and Sp. Posthumius: and right well, as Sigonius thinketh: for Tiberius was the fore-name of the Veturii. The Greek records, and Cuspinian's book, have Albinus and Calvinus.

Interregens, all one year.

Sigonius and Onuphrius insert this one year without Consuls, besides the account of the years, according to the Capitoll monuments, albeit they see neither in Livy, nor in any other, mention thereof; and all to make up the totall sum collected by Varro. And that the said year should at this time especially be interposed, the tables of the Capitoline records do shew. For whereas in them thus engraven it is, M. Valerius Corvus Consul the fourth time, in the year of the City 419, and again L. Aemilius and C. Plantius, in the year 414: to the end that these records might agree one with another, of necessity there must be put a year between. For leave out that, then both L. Aemilius the Consul should fall upon the year 414, and the totall sum of the year in Varro and the Capitoline tables be overthrown. That this odd year was now above all other times to be cast between, Gregory Halaander (who left in writing a Chronology of the Consuls) saw long before them: for he over-passed this year wholly, noted without Consuls. But Sigonius and Onuphrius are of opinion, that this year there was an Anarchy, and the Common-weal without Consuls, or other Magistrats of state, by occasion of the pestilence, whereof Livy writeth.

M. Cornelius II. Cn. Domitius.

Marcus Cornelius the second time Cof. with Cn. Domitius is by Livy, and Cassiodorus set down down, Diodorus nameth them A. Cornelius and C. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Calvinus and Cossus.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Valerius.

After this, were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Valerius, as Livy and Cassiodorus report. In Diodorus also they be set down by the name of C. Valerius and M. Clodius. Livy saith, that he findeth in the Annals, the surnames of Valerius diversly put down, namely, Flaccus and Potitus. Orosius calleth these Consuls, Claudius Marcellus, and Valerius Flaccus. The Sicilian registers, Potitus and Marcellus. Sigonius and Onuphrius retain their surnames, that it may seem, how to the old surname Potitus of the House Valeria, this new surname of Flaccus is a later addition.

L. Papyrius Crassus II. L. Plantius Venno.

These Consuls are by Livy and Cassiodorus recited this year. Diodorus concealeth their surnames. The Sicilian registers, make them known by the names of Crassus and Venno.

L. Emilius Mamercinus. C. Plautius.

Next to them (according to Livy and Cassiodorus) were L. Emilius Mamercus, and C. Plautius created Consuls. Diodorus nominateth L. Papyrius with L. Plotius. The Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and Decianus. How both these are to be described, their triumphs upon record in the Capitol do evidently shew. These Consuls entered upon their government the first day of July.

P. Plautius Proculus. P. Cornelius Scapula.

L*ivy* and Cassiodorus put down [for Consuls] P. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula. Diodorus, P. Cornelius and A. Posthumus. The Sicilian registers, Venno and Scipio. Onuphrius thinketh this Plautius ought to be forenamed not Publius but cainus: who in his Consulship which he bare afterwards with Appius Cacus, was surnamed Venno (as Frontinus supposeth) for finding certain springs and veins of water within the earth.

C. Plautius Proculus. Q. Publilius Philo II.

L*ivy* and Cassiodorus march together in the Consulship for this year, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publilius Philo. Diodorus L. Cornelius and Q. Publilius. The Sicilian registers, Lentulus and Philo.

L. Papyrius Mugillanus Cursor. C. Papius.

C*onstituted consuls this year, C. Papius*

the third time, and L. Papyrius Mugillanus, by Cassiodorus. Solinus maketh mention of these Consuls in his five and thirtieth chapter. As for Papyrius, Livy indeed surnameth him here Mugillanus, but he saith that he findeth him in other Annals by the name of Cursor. In the Greek seconds they be Liko and Cursor. Now as touching C. Papius, he is to be written with the numerall note II. and not III. as Sigonius and Onuphrius do admonish. For it is not the same man who was Consul in the 393 year, but his son.

L. Furius Camillus II. Junius Brutus Scaeva.

L*ivy* and Cassiodorus put down for consuls, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Junius Brutus Scaeva. Diodorus, L. Furius, and D. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Brutus.

Lucius Furius, unto whom the charge of Samnium fell by lot, forinued by occasion of sickness to forgo the war there, and was commanded to nominate for the managing of martiall affairs a Dictator: whereupon he pronounced L. Papyrius Cursor, the bravest warrior in those daies; by whom Q. Fabius Rullianus was named great Master of the horse. Afterwards Cursor turned him out of that Mastership of horse, because without his warrant he had fought (although it were fortunately) against the Samnites when himself was out of the way and gone to Rome for to take the Auspices anew: and in his room he substituted L. Papyrius Crassus. Thus write Livy, Enstropius, and Valerius, in the second book.

C. Sulpitius Longus II. Q. Emilius [L. Aulius]

L*ivy* and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Consuls this year, Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius: whom the Capitol records of the triumphs name Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, and D. Fulvius Corvus. Marvell it is therefore, that in the Sicilian registers they are put down, Cursor and Sylla.

Q. Fabius. L. Fulvius.

L*ivy* and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Consuls this year, Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius: whom the Capitol records of the triumphs name Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, and D. Fulvius Corvus. Marvell it is therefore, that in the Sicilian registers they are put down, Cursor and Sylla.

T. Verrinus Calvinus. Sp. Posthumus.

This year Livy and Cassiodorus set forth for Consuls, T. Verrinus Calvinus and Sp. Posthumus. Cicero in his third book of Offices writeth, that they were twice Consuls.

calleth the one of them T. Calpurnius, by a familiar forename unto that house and kindred of the Veturii. The Greek records exhibit unto us Calpurnius and Albinus. Of these consuls as also of the Caudine peace, Cicero in his book of old age; Pliny also in his book of famous men; Gellius in his 17 book and 21 chap. Florus in his 1 book and 16 chap. and Orosius in his 3 book and 15 chap. do make mention.

L. Papyrius Cursor II. C. Publius Philo.

Livy and Cassiodorus shew for this years Consuls, Q. Publius Philo and L. Papyrius Cursor, the second time. The Sicilian registers, Cursor and Philo. But that this Philo should now be third time Consul, his Consulships do plainly shew.

L. Papyrius Cursor, or Mugillanus. Q. Annius Cerretanus II.

Livy saith, there is some doubt, whether L. Papyrius Cursor were this year created Consul the third time, with Q. Annius Cerretanus the second time: and for his good service in war at Luceria, continued still in government: or rather L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and so the surname was mistaken. Cassiodorus delivereth unto us L. Papyrius and Q. Annius Cerretanus. The Sicilian registers, Papyrius and Cerretanus. The monument of his triumph in the Capitoll, alloweth of cursor and not Mugillanus. The author of that book which Cyprianus hath set forth, following other Annals, setteth down Mugillanus.

M. Fostius Flaccinator. L. Plantius Venno.

Seeing that for twelve years next ensuing, we have the Capitoline tables whole and sound, the less trouble we need to be at in reforming and redressing the names of the Magistrats. Both they, and also Livy with Cassiodorus represent unto us for this years Consuls, M. Fostius Flaccinator and L. Plantius Venno. Diodorus calleth them, L. Plotius and publi. The Sicilian registers, Venno and Flaccus.

437

C. Junius Bubulcus. Q. Emilius Barbula.

Cassiodorus putteth down C. Junius and Q. Emilius Barbula for Consuls. Livy, C. Junius Bubulcus, and Quintus Emilius Barbula. A stone in the Capitoll, Q. Emilius Barbula, and C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

438

Sp. Nautius. M. Popilius.

Next follow in order Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius Consuls, according to Livy and Cassiodorus. Rutilus and Lana their surnames, are by Sigonius restored unto them: and the same also are to be seen in the Sicilian books of record.

L. Papyrius Cursor III. Q. Publius Philo III.

The Consuls names of this year, through the default of the writers that copied forth Livies books, are there left out: namely, L. Papyrius Cursor the fourth time, and Q. Publius Philo likewise the fourth times as it is written in Cassiodorus, in the Capitoll tables, and in Cassiodorus book, wherein they are named cursor and Philo. Howbeit, in the Sicilian registers they are called cursor and Lana.

M. Paetelins. C. Sulpitius.

Livy and Cassiodorus report for Consuls this year, C. Sulpitius and M. Paetelins. But Diodorus hath C. Sulpitius and judex corruptly for paetelins. The Capitoline writers, have M. Paetelins Libo and C. Sulpitius Longus the third time. The Sicilian registers, Longus and paetelins, but there is a fault, as Sigonius truly thinketh.

L. Papirius Cursor V. C. Junius Bubulcus.

Diodorus putteth down for Consuls this year L. Papirius fifth time, and C. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Cursor and Bubulcus. But Livy and Cassiodorus, L. Papirius Cursor V. and C. Junius Bubulcus II. Festus maketh mention also of these Consuls in his 18 book.

M. Valerius. C. Decius.

Livy writeth that there followed consuls M. Valerius Max. and P. Decius: but Cassiodorus, saith M. Valerius and P. Decius. Frontinus in his book of water-conduits, speaketh of these Consuls: whom he writeth to have been thirty years after the beginning of the Samnite war. As for P. Decius, Livy afterwards calleth Max. The Sicilian registers have Max. and Max.

C. Junius Bubulcus III. Q. Emilius Barbula II.

We find in Livy for Consuls this year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emilius Barbula the second time: likewise in Cassiodorus. But Diodorus nameth them C. Junius and Q. Emilius. In the Sicilian registers, Bubulcus and Barbula. The same names are also in the Capitoll monuments, which be in Livy.

C. Martius Rutilus. Q. Fabius.

C. Aius Martius Rutilus and Q. Fabius be this years Consuls in Livy. But in Cassiodorus, C. Martius Rutilus and Q. Fabius the second time. Diodorus hath C. Martius and Q. Fabius the second time. The Sicilian registers shew Rutus and and Rutilus. The Capitol monuments, Q. Fabius, Max. Rutilius, the second time, and C. Marius, who afterwards in his second Censorship in the 498 year, is surnamed Censorinus.

A year without Consul P. Durini Dist. 11.

Verrinus Flaccus interposeth this year also without Consuls, wherein he reporteth L. Papius Dictator the 2. time, with C. Junius Bubulenus Bruns, the Master of the horse. This year Diodorus, Livy, the Greek records, Cuspinians book and Cassiodorus do overlap. For Livy writeth that L. Papius Ensur was nominated by the consul Dictator, and by him C. Junius Bubulenus named Master of the horse: upon occasion that C. Marius the Cos. had no good fortune in his conduct of the wars in Samnium. This inserting of one year Onuphris hath approved, that the computation of the years gathered by Varro might stand in force, which to the Capitoll tables putteth one year, whose judgment we also are willing to follow.

446 Q. Fabius. P. Decius.

Livy writeth, that Fabius continued Consul this year also, for his singular good service in subduing and taming Hetruria: and that he had for his companion in government Decius. Cassiodorus acknowledgeth for Cons. Q. Fabius the third time, and P. Decius the second time. Diodorus, P. Decius: and Q. Fabius. The Sicilian registers Mus and Rullus, The Capiroline tables, P. Decius Mus 17. and Q. Fabius Max. Rullianus the third time.

447
App. Clandius. et L. Voluminus.

Livy saith, that immediately there followed Consuls, App. Claudius and L. Volturnius, Cassiodorus and Diodorus, Appius and Violens. The Sicilian registers, App. Claudius Cacus, and L. Volturnius. The Capitoline monuments have Flamma and Violens. Now whether one of these Consuls turn out to be Violens or Violensius, Onuphrius adviseth us to consider. For the Capitoline Stone hath it alwaies written Violens. But the Greek words have Appius and Βιολέντιος as if the name were Violensius.

Q. Martinus Tramelus, P. Cornelius Arvina.

Livy, Cassiodorus register for the Consuls of this year, Q. Marius Tremulus; with a College: as disposed unto him Diodorus saith Q.
Marius And P. Cornelius. The Sicilian records, Tremulus and Petrina. M. has was a great signified, M. has was old; the Capitol book the M. Q. to hold it 449. With this first history of Rome. The Roman & Latinus were reported consuls by Diodorus, Livy and Cassio-

Calpurnius book sheweth Magellus and Aufidius. These Cons. doth L. Pl. put down for to succeed Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out those two years wherein we have let down Isid. writeth) that Claudius with Plautinus, and Cornelius with Martius were consuls. Whether his memory failed him in digesting of the annals, or of purpose he supposed that those two couple of Consuls were not truly recorded, and therefore overleapt them, I know not. A fragment there is of the Capitoline stone, which sheweth for this year, Magellus to be the surname of Posthumius, Tiberius the forename of Minucius, and M. of Fulvius. Now the surnames of Fulvius were curvus and Patinus, as it appeareth written in his triumph.

P. Sempronius Sophus. P. Sulpitius Saverrio.

THe Consuls next following were P. Sulpitius Saverrio, and P. Sempronius Sophus, according to Livy and Cassiodorus. In Diodorus they are written P. Sulpitius and P. Sempronius. In the Greek registers, they stand Sempronius and Saverrio. Pliny writeth of these Consuls in his 33 book: but Sempronius he calleth Longus. Both of them are described thus by their triumphs, appearing upon record in the Capitoll, for in their Consulship there is no more to be seen but Sophus and Publius.

411
D. Gonninus. Sir. Cornelius.

Diodorus, Livy and Cassiodorus report for Coss. this year, L. Genucius, and Servius Cornelius. The Sicilian registers have Aventinus and Leunius. The Capitoline writers put unto Cornelius the surname of Leunius.

M. Moins Denter. M. Amylins.

Livy nameth for Consuls this year M. Livius and C. Aemilius. Cassiodorus, M. Livius and L. Aemilius. Diodorus, M. Livius and M. Aemilius. As for the forename to Aemilius, Sigonius and Onuphrius do think that more credit is to be given unto Diodorus, than others: especially, seeing that in Livy there is mention made the year following of M. Aemilius Paulus Generall of the horsemen, whom they all think to be the same man that this Consul, M. Livius is written Denter in the Capitoll records, which surname Livy in another place addeth to the Livii. Cuspinianus book in like manner setteth down Denter and Paulus as the surnames of these Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Denter and Aemilius.

Two Dictators, and no Consul.

THis year also of two Dictators without Consuls, Omphrius inserteth in his Kalender, howbeit directed thereto by evidence of the Capitoll fragments: to the end that the calculation of Varro might agree in all respects which.

which, if this year were over-slipped should be wholly overthrow: although Diadart, Livy, and Cassiodorus dissent therefrom, and leave out this year altogether. Whereof see Omphrius more at large in his Kalender upon this year 453.

454 M. Valerius, Q. Apuleius Pansa.

Immediately after M. Livius and M. Aemilius, Livy, and Cassiodorus letteth pass the year of two Dictators without Consuls, bring in M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius Pansa for Consuls. The Greek records shew Corvinus and Pansa. It seemeth that Livy by Marcus Valerius meaneth Maximus, for that he saith that presently upon his Dictatorship he was made Col. Now that Mar. Valerius Max. was Dictator the year before, he writeth plainly.

455 M. Fulvius Patrus, T. Manlius Torquatus.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare for Consuls this year, M. Fulvius Patrus and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers have Patrinus and Torquatus. Livy saith that Q. Fabius refused the Consulship offered unto him without any suit of his. But T. Manlius the Consul, was by lot appointed to levy war against Heiruria, which took arms and prepared for war against the truce accorded upon. Now was he scarce well entred into the enemies confines, but as he exercised among men of arms, and chanced to turn about his horse upon a full carrier, he was cast from his back: whereupon (for the present) he lay for dead, and within three daies after the said fall ended his life. Then all the Centuries in general by their suffrages chose M. Valerius Col, whom the Senat. purposed to have made Dictator. Thus much Livy. By M. Valerius he meaneth Corvus, whom Cicero writeth in his book of old age, and Valerius Max. in his 7 book and 48 chap. to have been Col. now the sixt time, and that between this and the first there were 46 years, although Plutarch in the life of C. Marius saith they were but 45. Howbeit all of them call him Corvinus and not Corvus.

456 L. Cornelius Scipio, Cn. Fulvius.

Cn. Fulvius and L. Cornelius Scipio are recorded Consuls by Livy and Cassiodorus; but Scipio and Centumalus, by Cyprianus book: Scipio and Maximus by the Greek records.

457 Q. Fabius Max. IV., P. Decius Mus III.

Livy and Cassiodorus alledge for Cons. this year, Q. Fabius Max. the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus thrice. The same Cons. Cyprianus book and the Greek records delivered unto us. The author that writeth of famous men, and Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, speak of P. Decius thrice Consul.

458 L. Postumius Megellus, M. Atilius Regulus.

L. Postumius of noble blood, were created Cons. this year: even the same men who in their former Consulship were matched together as Livy and Cassiodorus write: but in the Sicilian registers they are found written, Claudius and Volturnus. Howbeit, Cicero in his book entitled Ca- re reporteth, that between the two Consulships of Postumius were ten years.

459 Q. Fabius V., P. Decius IV.

Livy and Cassiodorus both witness, that the Cons. next following, were Q. Fabius the fift time, and P. Decius the 4 time, who had been companions together already in 2 Consulats and in one Censorship. The Sicilian registers have Rullus and Mus: of which Consuls Cicero speaketh very often; Valer. Max. likewise, Petrarchus also, Plutarch, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, the author of the book of famous men, Entropius, Orosius, and others: who all report, that the Cons. P. Decius, following the example of his father, offered himself to die for the Roman legions, and by his death purchased a notable victory to the people of Rome.

460 L. Postumius Megellus, M. Atilius Regulus.

The Cons. next following, were L. Postumius Megellus, and M. Atilius Regulus, as Livy and Cassiodorus write. In the Sicilian records, their surnames are Megellus and Regulus.

461 L. Papirius Cursor, Sp. Carvilius.

After Livy and Cassiodorus, in the Cons. this year were L. Papirius Cursor and Sp. Carvilius. After the Sicilian registers, Cursor & Max. A stone in the Capitol maketh mention of Papirius the son of Is, nephew of P. surnamed Cursor, whom Livy writeth to be the son of Papirius 5 times Cons. Of these Cons. Pliny of Verona maketh mention in his 7 book and 60 chap. Val. Max. likewise in his 7 book and 1 chap. Frontinus in his 2 book: and the same Livy in the year 456.

462 Q. Fabius Gurgus Max., Decius Junius Brutus, son of Struvalius.

The year following had Consuls, Q. Fabius Gurgus, and Decius Junius Brutus Sons, as witnesses Livy and Cassiodorus. Zonaras matcheth them, Junius Brutus and Q. Fabius Max. Cyprianus Kalender, Maximus and Severus. The Sicilian registers, Brutus and Maximus. Livy, Pliny in his 7 book, the Capitol tables, and Zonaras, have delivered, that this Fabius was the son of Q. Max. Rullianus, who had been 3 times Cons. before. And here an end of the Consuls for the first 40 books.

L. Postumius. C. Junius.

Since that after this Consularship, ten books of Livy next ensuing be lost, whom hitherto we have had for the most sufficient witness of this story, so as now we are in manner destitute and deprived of the best helps of Annals, namely Diodorus, Dionysius, and Livy from hence forward we will use principally in digesting and reckoning the years by the Consuls, the authority and testimony of Cassiodorus, the Sicilian records, and Cuspinianus book: yet will we not in the mean while reject what help soever shall be ministered unto us by others. For this year therefore Cassiodorus writeth, that L. Postumius and C. Junius, were created Cons. whose surnames, Megellus, and Babulcius, have not been left out so much as in Cassiodorus Kalender, nor in the Sicilian records. Livy also maketh mention of them in his 28 book, saying thus, Luc. Postumius Megellus the Interregent, was created Cons. with C. Babulcius, by that very court and assembly which himself called and held.

P. Cornelius Rufinus. M. Curius Dentatus

The Cons. this year are recorded by Cassiodorus, Pub. Cornelius Rufinus, and M. Curius Dentatus for whom in the Sicilian registers, appear Maximus the third time, and Mus the six time. But of those forenamed Cons. Cicero maketh mention in his book, entituled Cato; Paterculus in his first book, Valerius Max. in his six book and 3 chap. Pliny also in his 7 book and 50 chap. Now this M. Curius was called Dentatus, as Pliny writeth in his 6 book and 16 chap. for that he came into the world with teeth.

M. Valerius. Q. Cadius.

Arcus Valerius and Q. Cadius were afterwards Cons. as saith Cassiodorus. The old book of Cuspinianus putteth to them the surnames of Cominus and Noctus: which in the Sicilian registers, are overpassed. The Greek records shew unto us, Maximus and Mus: for Maximus was a surname also of the Valerii Corvini.

Q. Martius. P. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus this year delivereth for Consuls, Q. Martius and P. Cornelius, Cuspinianus book and the Greek records add their surnames, Tremulus II. and Arvius II. who had been Consuls together once before.

467

M. Marcellus. Sp. Nautius.

Cassiodorus avoucheth Consuls this year, M. Marcellus and Cn. Nautius. The Greek records and Cuspinianus book, have Marcellus and Rutilius.

468

M. Valerius. C. Aelius.

Arcus Valerius and C. Aelius are ranged in this year for Cons. by Cassiodorus, Cuspinianus book putteth forth, Maximus and Papus: but the Greek records, Pomus and Parnus. Now you must think, that both Maximus and Parnus are the surnames of the Valerii.

C. Claudius. M. Aemilius.

For this years Cons. Cassiodorus hath C. Claudius and M. Aemilius. The Greek records and Cuspinianus book, Canida & Lepidus: where of the former is the surname of Claudius, the latter of Aemilius.

C. Servilius. L. Caelius.

By Cassiodorus, C. Servilius and L. Caelius Mecellus are placed Cons. in this year: for whereas in some copies of Cassiodorus, instead of L. Caelius, is written Calus that is a fault: as Sigonius and Onuphrius have noted. To Servilius this Consul, the Greek records add the surname of Turca, whom they put down Cons. with Dentus, they would say Dentus, as both Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose. For Dentus is a surname also given to the Caelius, as appeareth by Livy.

P. Cornelius Dolabella. Cn. Domitius.

Cassiodorus interreth P. Corn. Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius for Cons. Cuspinianus Kalender hath Dolabella and Calvus. The Sicilian registers, Dolabella Maximus. And some think that Maximus was the surname of Dolabella, which he seemeth to have acquired by the honour that he had won in the war against the Gauls.

C. Fabricius. Q. Aemilius.

Cassiodorus bringeth in for Cons. C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: but the Sicilian registers, Luscinus and Papus. Of them Cicero in his book Leius, maketh mention in this manner: We see that Papus Aemilius was familiarly acquainted with C. Luscinus: for so we have heard our fathers say that they were two Cons. together, and companions in the censorship. Moreover, Valerius in his chap. where he treateth of Poverty, maketh mention of C. Fabricius, and Q. Aemilius Papus. This Aemilius, Plutarch in his Parallels calleth corruptly by the name of Paulus.

Here followed cons. as Cassiodorus sheweth, L. Aemilius & Q. Martius, unto whom Cuspinianus book and the Greek records give also their surnames, Barbula and Philippus: and the same also is evident by the records in the Capitol of their triumphs:

474

P. Valerius. T. Cornucaninus.

Pub. Valerius and T. Cornucaninus are by Cassiodorus placed in this year for Cons. The Greek records, Cuspinian's book, Florus, Orosius, and Eutropius, give to Valerius the surname of Levinus. And Plinarch hath assigned for Levinus for 474.

475

P. Sulpitius. P. Decius.

Next after those, Cassiodorus putteth down P. Sulpitius Consul with P. Decius. The Sicilian registers, have Savennio and Man. Cicero in his 2 book, entituled De Fin. and in his Tusculan disputations, saith, That this Pub. Decius was the son of that P. Decius who vowed himself to death in the Samnits and Gauls war.

476

C. Fabricius. Q. Aemilius.

Cassiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: whom Cuspinian's book and the Greek records, call Lusitanus the second time, and Papus. That these were fellows together once before in the Consulship, Cicero writeth in his book Lalins, Plinarch in Pyrrhus, Gellius 3 book, chap. 8. Eutropius, and Zonaras, make report of the same.

P. Cornelius. C. Junius.

Pub. Cornelius, and C. Junius, are rehearsed for Consuls this year by Cassiodorus. Cuspinian's book hath Rufinus the second time, and Brutus. The Greek records, Rufinus and Babulcus. Zonaras hath Rufinus & Junius. Of P. Rufinus twice Cons. Cic. in his 2. book Of a perfect Orator, Valer. Max. in his 3. book, and 4. chap. Gellius in his 4 book, and 8 chap. in his 17 book likewise and 21 chap. and last of all, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, make mention.

Q. Fabius. C. Genucius.

Cassiodorus reporteth Q. Fabius and C. Genucius Consuls. The Sicilians registers have Gurges and Clepsina. Of these Cons. Orosius maketh mention in this wise: When Fabius Gurges was the second time Cons. with C. Genucius Clepsina, a grievous pestilence reigned both in the City, and also in the territory about it.

479

M. Curius. L. Lentulus.

Cassiodorus and Eutropius deliver unto us for Cons. M. Curius and L. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers, Dentatus and Lentulus. This is the third Consulship of M. Curius, which together with Lentulus Consulship, is drawn out of the Capitoll records of triumph this year.

480

Serv. Cornelius. M. Curius.

Cassiodorus setteth for this years Cons. Servius Cornelius and M. Curius. Cuspinian's book and the Greek records, Merenda & Dentatus the third time. This M. Curius is now Cons. the fourth time, for, thrice he was before. Concerning this Serv. Cornelius Merenda, Plinarch relateth and writeth, that he received a princely cotoner of gold at the hands of L. Lentulus the Cons. of the former year, for winning a town of the Samnits.

C. Fabricius. C. Claudius.

Cassiodorus setteth down, C. Fabricius and C. Claudius Consuls: the Sicilian records, Licinius and Canina. Cuspinian's Kalender, Licinius and Cinna. Eutropius, Licinius and C. Claudius Canina. Pilleius, Fabius Dorso and Claudius Canina. Whereby it may be understood, that these Consuls were called, C. Fabius Dorso Licinius, and Caius Claudius Canina: for Dorso was an old name of the Fabii.

L. Papirius Cursor. Sp. Carvilius.

Next after them, Cassiodorus nominateth for Cons. Sp. Carvilius and L. Papirius Cursor. The records both of Sicily and Cuspinian, have Cursor and Maximus. Both these were now Cons. the second time as appeareth by their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll. Frontinus speaketh of them in his book Of water-conduits, and Livy in his 24 book.

C. Quintus. L. Genucius.

It is reported by Cassiodorus, that C. Quintus and L. Genucius were Consuls. Cuspinian's book and the Greek records, set to their surnames, Claudius and Clepsina. Livy in his 7 book speaketh of one Tit. Quintus lame of one leg, from whom haply this surname is drawn.

C. Genucius. Cn. Cornelius.

Reported there are for Consuls this year by Cassiodorus, C. Genucius and Cn. Cornelius: whose surnames were Clepsina and Blasio, as it appeareth in Cuspinian's book. This Caius Genucius is the same, who before-time was Consul. As for C. Blasio, he is described by his Consulship standing upon record in the Capitoll. The Greek records over-pass them both.

485

P. Sempronius. } or after } Q. Ogulphius
App. Claudius. } some, } Fabius Pictor

After Cornelius and Genucius Consuls, Cassiodorus bringeth in Pub. Sempronius, and App.

App. Claudius, and of purpose over-skipeth Q. Gule and Fabius Pictor. Zonaras, Q. Gallus and C. Fabius. Of them speaketh Europius, saying: When Q. Gule and Fabius Pictor were Consuls, the Picentes raised war; and by the Consuls next following, to wit, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, they were vanquished. Pliny also in his 33 book and 3 chap. When Q. Fabius (quoth he) was Consul, silver was coined and stamped for money, five years before the [second] Punic war. These Consuls, Valerius also reckoneth in his first book. But Sigismus and Onuphrius advertise us, that the book of Europius is very faulty in one of these Consuls, and that in lieu of Q. Gule, it should be read Q. Ogulvius: for of this Gule, there is in no place besides any mention: so as they would have, that it should be Q. Ogulvius, son of L. nephew of A. surnamed Gallus, who a litle before was sent in embassage to Propercius. And it falleth out passing well, that they should match Ogulvius a commoner, with Fabius a Patrician. Also Onuphrius testifieth, that in the most ancient hand-written books of Europius, the name is found of Ogulvius. And, as both the Greek records, and also Zonaras, together with the more ancient and perfect copies of Europius, agree to this his judgment: so Hubertus Goltzius likewise in his Catalogue of Consuls, embraceth the same: and that which maketh most for the purpose, the old antiquities of coin witness as much. But in the mean while this is worth the observation, that oftentimes in the most ancient pieces of money, the letter C is written for G: as for example here, Ocul. Cal. for Ogul. Calba.

Being that we settle the Consulship of the former year, in Ogulvius and Fabius Pictor, and that upon the authority of Europius, the Greek records, Cuspinianus, Zonaras, Onuphrius, and others; we will set down for this years Consuls, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, whom Velleius in his first book calleth, Sempronius Sophus, and Appius the son of Cacilius. The Greek records, Sempronius Rufus Sophus: and Cuspinianus book Rufus. Moreover, this also Goltzius giveth us to understand, that the surname of this Sempronius is in old peeces of coin found written without an aspiration [Sopus] which is no rare thing to be seen in such antiquities: for we read in others of them, Philippus, Tampilus, Gracchus, Pulcher, Triumpus, for Philippus, Tampibilus, Gracchus, Pulcher, Triumphus, and such like.

Europius putteth down for Consuls, M. Attilius and L. Julius Libo. The Sicilian registers, Rogatus and Libo. Cassiodorus, M. Attilius and L. Julius. And both of them are taken forth of the records of capitol triumphs.

Cassiodorus reporteth for Cons. this year, D. Iunius and N. Fabius: the Sicilian registers Pars and Pictor: the capitol records at triumphs, D. Iunius son of D. nephew of D. surnamed Pars, and N. Fabius son of C. nephew of M. surnamed Pictor. Upon what occasion these Fabii took the surname of Pictor, Pliny sheweth in his 35 book chap. 4. Valer. Max. in his 4 book and 3 chap. seemeth to note and signify, that Fabius Gurgus and N. Fab. Pictor, lived at one and the same time.

This year also Cassiodorus passeth over. The Greek records shew, Maximus and Vulturnus, Zonaras, Q. Fabius, and Emilius (no doubt) for Mamilius by some error and fault of the copies. Cuspinian out of some old books delivereth unto us for Consuls, Q. Fab. Maximus and L. Mamilius. Onuphrius thinketh, that Q. Fab. Maximus Gurgus was now thrice Consul.

App. Claudius. M. Fulvius.

Besides the capitol monuments, Polybius in his first book maketh mention of these Consuls. Gellius also, who calleth them thus; App. Claudius brother of Cacilius surnamed Caudex, and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. In like manner Livy, Paterculus, and Pliny in his book of famous men: as also Appianus, Florus, Frontinus in his 1 book of Stratagems, Europius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus.

M. Valerius.M. Otacilius.

Cassiodorus and Europius shew unto us, that M. Valerius and M. Otacilius were Cons. Zonaras nameth Valerius Max. and Otacilius Crassus. Cuspinianus Kalender and the Sicilian records, Max. Messala and Crassus. Of these Consuls, Ver. Flaccus, Polybius, Cassiodorus, Europius, and Macrobius out of Varro make report. As for Macrobius, he rendereth a reason, why M. Valerius was in this government of his named Messala: and Pliny likewise, in his sixth book and five and thirtieth chapter.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for next Consuls, L. Posthumus and Q. Mamilius. Zonaras nameth them, Posthumus Albinus and Quintus Mamilius. The Sicilian registers, Albinus and Vulturnus: but the capitol monuments, L. Posthumus son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, surnamed Megetus, and Q. Mamilius son of Q. nephew of M. surnamed Vulturnus.

T. Otacilius.

Polybius and Cassiodorus match together in the Consul for this year L. Valerius and T. Otacilius: the surname of Valerius is Flaccus; and of Otacilius, Crassus, as it appeareth upon the capitol and Sicilian records.

494

Cn. Cornelius.

C. Duilius.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras bring in for Coss. Cn. Cornelius and C. Duilius. In like manner also Polybius, but only that in lieu of Duilius he hath Cn. The Sicilian Registers shew Scipio and Duilius. Cn. Cornelius Scipio is intimated also Asina, by the capital writers Orosius, Eutropius, and Valerius in his six book chap. 10. of which surname Macrobius writeth thus in his first book of Saturnalia: The surname of Asina (qd. he) was given to the Cornelius for that the first of the House Cornelii having either bought land, or given his daughter in marriage, when (after the solemn manner) he was required to put in good sureties for security, brought into the open market place a she ass laden with money, and pawned down that presently in stead of pledges.

495

C. Aquilius son of M. L. Cornelius son of L.

There are nominated by Cassiodorus for Consuls, C. Aquilius and L. Cornetius. The Sicilian registers, Florus and Scipio. Zonaras, C. Florus and L. Scipio. Eutropius and Orosius, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Aquilius Florus. Polybius leaveth them out. The Capitoline monuments agree with the Annals of Eutropius and Orosius.

496

A. Atilius Calatinus, Q. Sulpicius.

Polybius avoucheth for this years Consuls, A. Atilius and C. Sulpicius. Cassiodorus, A. Atilius Calatinus, and C. Sulpicius. The Sicilian Registers and Cuspinians Kalender, Calatinus and Paterculus. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Calatinus and C. Sulpicius Paterculus. Zonaras, Atilius Calatinus, and Caius Sulpicius. Of these Consuls, Polybius, Cicero, Valerius, Florus, Frontinus in his Stratagems, Pliny the younger, Gellius, Eutropius, and Cassiodorus make mention. But concerning the forename of Sulpicius Paterculus, the Capitoline tables disagree one from another: to wit, those that carry the records of the triumphs, from those that shew the Consulships and other magistracies: for in these latter monuments he is called Quintus, in the former Caius. Whereby Goltzius doth conjecture, that one man was not the author of both those records, namely, the Triumphal and the Consular.

497

Cn. Cornelius.

C. Atilius.

Cassiodorus sheweth unto us, Cn. Cornelius, and C. Atilius Serranus, for Consul: but Polybius, C. Atilius. The capitol tables, C. Atilius Regulus. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian registers, have Regulus and Blase the second time. But how Atilius should come by his surname Serranus, Pliny sheweth in his 8 book, saying: In these daies the fields were tilled by the very hands of the Generals themselves, and a man verily would believe thereby, that the ground joyed in a laureat ploughshare and a triumphant plowman. Him they found sowing, unto him they presented those honorable dignities, and so took he his surname Serranus. As concerning Blase, all authors well need besides, approve the judgement of Cuspinians: but Goltzius supposeth, that he was not the same man that was Consul before: and therefore he writeth him the son of C. nephew of L. without putting to the numeral note II.

The next Consuls that succeeded, were (by Cassiodorus his saying) Q. Cadius and L. Manlius. The Sicilian registers name them, Vulso and Cadius. Zonaras, M. Regulus and L. Manlius. Eutropius, M. Atilius Regulus and L. Manlius Vulso: and Polybius, M. Atilius and L. Manlius. Insenus in his 4 book maketh mention of these Consuls. But ye must understand, that Q. Cadius died while he was in office, and M. Atilius was substituted in his room, and made Consul the second time: as appeareth evidently by the capitol tables, wherein it standeth thus upon record, L. Manlius Vulso Longus: and in stead of Q. Cadius, M. Atilius Regulus the second time: as also, by Cuspinians book, wherein is written, Longus and Regulus.

M. Aemilius Paulus, Ser. Fulvius Nobilior.

Polybius sheweth for the Coss. this year, Ser. Fulvius and M. Aemilius. Cuspinians Kalender, Nobilior and Paulus. The Sicilian registers, Patinus and Paulus. Cassiodorus and Eutropius together with the Capitoline records have Ser. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Aemilius Paulus.

Cn. Cornelius. A. Atilius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius report for this years Consuls, Cn. Cornelius and A. Atilius. The capitol authors write, A. Atilius Calatinus the second time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina likewise a second time. As touching Cn. Cornelius Asina twice Consul, thus writeth Valerius in his six book: Cn. Cornelius S. Asina, who being Consul, was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians at Lipara when he had by the law new of arms lost what he had, he had recovered all again, and was made Consul the second time: so as of a Consul he became a captive, and of a captive twice Consul.

Cn. Servilius.

C. Sempronius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for Consuls, Cn. Servilius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian registers, Cato and Blacas. Zonaras, Servilius Cato and C. Sempronius. Eutropius and Orosius, Cn. Servilius Cato and C. Sempronius. Of the last Consuls, Lucius in his 30 book maketh mention, as also a stone of the Capitol.

C. Aurelius Cotta.

P. Servilius.

Cassiodorus bringeth in as Cons. C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Geminus. The Sicilian registers, Cotta and Geminus: but those of the Capitol, C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Geminus. Zonaras, Pub. Servilius and C. Aurelius. Cicero in his book, entitled Lucullus, writeth, that C. Cotta, together with P. Servilius Geminus, was twice Consul. Frontinus also in his fourth book of Stratagemis, and likewise Orosius, make mention of C. Cotta Consul in Sicily.

L. Caecilius Metellus. C. Furius.

Polybius setteth down for Consuls, L. Caecilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Pacilius. Zonaras, Caecilius Metellus, and C. Furius. Cassiodorus, L. Caecilius and C. Furius. Eutropius, Orosius, and a capitol stone; L. Caecilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius Pacilius. This is that L. Metellus, twice Consul and high priest, of whom Pliny writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter.

C. Asilius Regulus. L. Manlius.

Polybius placeth for this years Consuls, C. Asilius and L. Manlius. Cassiodorus, C. Asilius Regulus, and L. Manlius. Orosius and a capitol stone, have C. Asilius Regulus, and L. Manlius Vulso, both Cons. the second time. Zonaras, C. Asilius the brother of Regulus, and L. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Regulus and Vulso.

P. Claudius.

L. Junius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius inter for Consuls the next year, Pub. Claudius and L. Junius. Zonaras, L. Junius and C. Pulcher. Florus and Strabo in Tiberius, put to Claudius the surname of Pulcher: and Censorinus to Junius of Pulcher: which also are upon record in the Sicilian and capitoline tables. Thus P. Claudius, Cato in his books of Divinatione, and of the nature of Animas, telleth the son of App. Cato: but Pliny in his book, and three and fortieth chapter, telleth the son of App. Cato. The capitoline tables take part with Cato. P. M. Maximus in his first book and fourth chapter, speaketh of the same Consuls.

P. Servilius.

C. Sempronius.

For Consuls this year, Cassiodorus putteth down P. Servilius and C. Sempronius. Cicero in his book Lucullus, telleth that there were twice Consuls. Which also is apparant by the capitoline and Sicilian tables: in which their surnames are to be seen, Geminus II. and C. Fall.

D. Caecilius.

N. Fabius.

It is recorded by Cassiodorus, that the Consuls of this year, were D. Caecilius and N. Fabius: but Zonaras nameth them, Caecilius Metellus, and Numerius Fabius. Cyprianus Kalendar and the Sicilian Registers, have them in this manner: Metellus II. and Bruto II. But the capitoline tables shew them thus, L. Caecilius Metellus II. N. Fabius Bruto II. Pliny also reporteth in his seventh book, that Metellus was twice Consul.

M. Fabius.

M. Opacilius.

Cassiodorus setteth down as Consuls, M. Fabius and M. Opacilius. The Sicilian Registers, Crassus and Licinius. Gellius in his tenth book and first chapter, hath P. Licinius and Opacilius Crassus. The capitol marble stones, M. Fabius Licinius, and M. Opacilius Crassus. Besides, Gellius in the place before alledged, Florus likewise in his 19 Breviary upon Livius maketh mention of these Consuls: as also Suetonius in Tiberius.

M. Fabius.

C. Asilius.

Cassiodorus reckoneth M. Fabius, and C. Asilius, Consuls for this year. The Sicilian tables, Bruto and Bulbus. But those of the capitol, M. Fabius Bruto, and C. Asilius Bulbus. Of Fabius the Consuls shipwrack, Florus speaketh out of the nineteenth book of Livy.

A. Manlius.

C. Sempronius.

For this years Consuls, Cassiodorus setteth forth unto us, A. Manlius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian records, Torquatus and Blacas. Cyprianus book hath Asilius and Blacas. The capitoline tables shew A. Manlius Torquatus Asilius, and C. Sempronius Blacas II.

C. Fundanius.

C. Sulpicius.

Cassiodorus putteth down, P. Fundanius, and C. Sulpicius for Consuls. The Sicilian writers, 512 Ennius and Gellius. The Capitol monuments, C. Fundanius Fundanus, and C. Salustius Gellius. Nona besides make mention of them.

513 C. Lucius Calpurnius. A. Postumius.

Cassiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls this year, C. Lucius and A. Postumius. The Sicilian records, Calpurnius and Albinus. Entropius, and the capitol marbles, C. Lucius Calpurnius, and A. Postumius Albinus.

513 Q. Lucius Cereus. A. Manlius.

Cassiodorus, Entropius, and Orosius, shew for consuls this year, Q. Lucius, and A. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Cereus and Torquatus. They of the capitol, Q. Lucius Cereus, and A. Manlius Torquatus Ardens II. Indeed C. Lucius Cereus, is named for an Ambassador by Levy in his 42 book.

514 C. Claudius Centho. M. Sempronius.

FOR this year there were Consuls, C. Claudius Centho, and M. Sempronius Tuditanus, according to Cassiodorus and the capitol writers. The Sicilian records testify also the same surnames. Of these consuls likewise, besides the capitol Writers, Cicero speaketh in his Caes and Brutus, where he calleth this year (according to the judgment of Atticus, whereto Varro also agreeth) the 514 year from the foundation of the city; as also in his first Tusculan question. So doth Gellius 17 book 21 chap. and Cassiodorus.

515 C. Mamilius. Q. Valerius.

NEXT there followed in consuls place, as witnesseth Cassiodorus, C. Mamilius, and Q. Valerius: but according to the Sicilian registers, Turrianus and Falco: and after the capitol records, C. Mamilius Turrianus, and Q. Valerius Falco. Besides, Verrinus Flaccus and Cassiodorus, Gellius also maketh mention of these Consuls, in his 17 book and 21 chapter. So doth Cicero in Brutus and the Tusculan questions, in which year they say, that Ennius the Poet was born.

516 T. Sempronius. P. Valerius.

FOR the year following, Cassiodorus hath consuls, T. Sempronius and P. Valerius. Gracchus and Falco, in Cyprianus Kalender and the Sicilian records. Zonaras avoucheth, Semp. Gracchus, and P. Valerius. The capitol writers, have T. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Valerius Falco. Orosius speaketh of these consuls.

517 L. Cornelius. Q. Fulvius.

NEXT to them, Cassiodorus reporteth for consuls, L. Cornelius and Q. Fulvius. Zo- nius, L. Lentulus and Q. Flaccus. Entropius, L. Cornelius, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The capitol registers give to Lentulus, the surname Candianus; and therefore in Cyprianus Kalender, they stand by the names of Candianus and Flaccus. As for the Sicilian registers, they leave them out clean.

518 C. Licinius. P. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls, C. Licinius and P. Cornelius. Zonaras, P. Licinius and Licinius Varus. The capitoline writers, C. Licinius Varus, and P. Cornelius Licinius Candianus. In like manner Censorinus; who reckoneth this for the 518 year after the cities foundation; following herein the computation of Varro, Cicero, and Pliny. Cyprianus Kalender and the Sicilian registers, name them Candianus and Varus.

519 T. Manlius Torquatus. C. Asilius.

THIS year had for consuls, as Cassiodorus saith, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Asilius. The Sicilian records, shew Torquatus and Bulbus: but Entropius, Orosius, and the capitol Tables shew, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Asilius Bulbus: unto Bulbus the capitol records put to the numeral note II. When T. Manlius Torquatus and C. Asilius Bulbus the second time were consuls, according to Verrinus Flaccus, Entropius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus, and that there was peace throughout all the empire of Rome, the Temple of Janus was shut the second time, as Plutarch sheweth in Numa; as Levy also, Velleius, Entropius, and Orosius, do testify.

520 L. Postumius. Sp. Carvilius.

Cassiodorus nameth for consuls this year, L. Postumius and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian Registers have Albinus and Ruga. Zonaras, Postumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius. The capitol writers have L. Postumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius Maximus. That Ruga was a surname to the Carvili, appeareth out of Gellius, who maketh mention of Sp. Carvilius Ruga, who at this time was the first that divorced his wife.

521 Q. Fabius. M. Pomponius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls, Q. Fabius and M. Pomponius. The Sicilian records Maximus and Matro. The capitoline writers have Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, and M. Pomponius Matro. Zonaras hath Q. Fabius Max. and M. Pomponius. The surname of Maximus, this Fabius took of his grand-father, and was not himself the first of that name, whatsoever Polibius writeth in his third book.

Varro as he was called besides of a went upon his lip, at Plutarch wineflesh, and he that wrote the treatise of Famous men.

Capitol records represent P. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Atilius Regulus. Gellius writeth of them in his 4 book and 3 chapter.

522 M. Lepidus.

M. Poplicius.

Marcus Lepidus and M. Poplicius are reputed to be Consuls this year by Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers have Lepidus and Malleolus. Zonaras hath M. Malleolus and M. Emylius. The Capitol tables shew M. Emylius Lepidus and M. Poplicius.

523 C. Papirius.

M. Pomponius.

Next after this were created Consuls, C. Papirius and M. Pomponius according to Cassiodorus, Zonaras, and Dionysius in his second book. The Sicilian registers shew Maso and Maho. But the Capitol records have C. Papirius Maso and M. Pomponius Maho. Of C. Papirius, son of C. surnamed Maso, a Pontify or Bishop, Livy speaketh in the year 540.

524 M. Emylius.

M. Junius.

Zonaras and Cassiodorus exhibit unto us for Consuls, M. Emylius and M. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Barbula and Pera. The Capitol records, M. Emylius Barbula and M. Junius Pera.

Cn. Fulvius.

Cassiodorus setteth down L. Postumius and Cn. Fulvius as Consuls. The Sicilian records Albinus and Centumalus. But those of the Capitol, and Entropius, present unto us L. Postumius Albinus and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus. Polybius nameth Cn. Fulvius and A. Postumius.

526 Q. Fabius II.

Sp. Carvilius.

There are by Cassiodorus nominated for Consuls this year; Q. Fabius Maximus the second time, and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian registers Maximus and Ruga. The Capitol writers set also unto Carvilius Maximus the mark and numeral note of a double Consulship. Cicero in his book entituled Cato, likewise in his second book of Rhetorical invention, maketh mention of these Consuls, and so doth Valerius in his chapter, discoursing of the kindnes and affectionate duty of children to their parents.

M. Atilius.

These are set down by Cassiodorus for Consuls this year, P. Valerius and M. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, have Flaccus and Regulus. The

M. Valerius.

Next after, Cassiodorus putteth L. Apustius and M. Valerius Consuls. The Sicilian tables Maximus and Apustius. The Capitol monuments L. Apustius Fullo, and M. Valer. Messala.

L. Aemilius.

Imediately followed Consuls, C. Atilius and L. Aemilius, as Cassiodorus and Polybius do witness: whom the Capitol writers call, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Aemilius Papus. The Sicilian registers, Regulus and Papus. Zonaras, Regulus and Emylius. Of these Consuls alio Orosius maketh mention: and Pliny in his third book and twentieth chapter, where untruly men read Paulus for Papus.

530 T. Manlius.

Q. Fulvius II.

The year following had Consuls T. Manlius and Q. Fulvius the second time, according to Cassiodorus and Polybius, and as Orosius saith, T. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. Cuspinians tables, together with the Capitoline, have Torquatus the second time, and Flaccus likewise the second time, shewing the surnames only of these Cons.

531 C. Flaminius.

P. Furius Philus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Cons. C. Flaminius and P. Furius. So doth Polybius. Zonaras nameth them Flaminius and Furius. Plutarch likewise in Marcellus. The Sicilian tables name them Flaminius and Philus. But the Capitol records, C. Flaminius, and P. Furius Philus.

532 M. Marcellus.

Cn. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus nameth for the next Consuls, M. Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius. Polybius, M. Claudius and Cn. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers Scipio and Marcellus. Zonaras, Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Scipio. Entropius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. The Capitoll tables M. Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus. This is that Marcellus, who was five times Consul: and this is that Scipio, who afterwards with his brother Scipio was slain in Spain by Asdrubal the Carthaginian.

M. Minutius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, C. Cornelius and M. Minutius. So doth Zonaras.

ras. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Rufus. Entropius hath P. Cornelius and M. Minutius Rufus. Cuspinianus book Asina and Rufus. Sigornius and Onuphrius both, do think that this P. Cornelius Scipio Asina was his son, who in the first Punick war was twice consul. And verily Livy, in the year 543 maketh mention of P. Cornelius Asina, an honorable Senator, and who had been consul.

534 L. Veturius, C. Lutatius.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras exhibit unto us for consuls, L. Veturius and C. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers Philo and Catulus. Cuspinianus book Philo and Scaevola.

535 M. Livius, L. Aemilius.

The consuls next following were M. Livius and L. Aemilius, as Cassiodorus witnesseth. Cuspinianus book and the Greek records shew Salinator and Paulus. Zonaras, M. Livius and Aemilius Paulus. Pliny maketh mention of these consuls in the 29 book and first chapter.

536 P. Cornelius Scipio, T. Sempronius Longus.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for consuls P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius. Zonaras, Sempronius Longus and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Longus and Scipio. Livy, Entropius, Probus, Orosius, and Padianus, name them P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus. While these were consuls, the second Punick war arose, as writers have delivered unto us in their chronicles.

537 Cn. Servilius Geminus, C. Flaminius.

Then followed consuls, as Polybius, Cassiodorus, and Livy write, Cn. Servilius, together with C. Flaminius. But the two last named, as also the Sicilian registers, have given to Servilius the surname of Geminus. C. Flaminius now second time consul, with like pride as heretofore, entered into his magistracy in the Ides of March: not at Rome but at Ariminum. The same man, in neglect and contempt of the Auspicia or signs of birds, at what time as he made head and went against Annibal coming into Italy, fought a battel at the lake Thrasymenus, where his army was wholly defeated and himself lost his life: into whose place M. Atilius Regulus, who had been consul before, was substituted. Thus much out of Livy and Polybius.

538 C. Terentius Varro, L. Aemilius Paulus.

Next to them Polybius bringeth in L. Aemilius and C. Terentius for consuls. The Sicilian registers, Paulus and Varro. Plutarch in Paulus, Terentius Varro, and Aemilius Paulus. Livy, Cassiodorus, and others, C. Terentius Varro, and L. Aemilius Paulus. Gellius noteth, that the father of C. Terentius Varro, was one Anlus, a thing by others passed over.

539 L. Posthumus Albinus, III.

M. Claudius Marcellus, II.

Q. Fabius Maximus, III.

T. Sempronius Gracchus.

Livy reporteth that the consuls elect for this year, when M. Junius the Dictator held the solemn assembly for the election, were Lucius Posthumus Albinus the third time, who as then ruled the province of Gaul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who had been master of the horse-men: and that Posthumus before that he entered into government, was by Annibal in France environed and slain, in whose stead M. Marcellus was subrogated consul now the second time: who upon information given by the Augurs, that his creation was not good, resigned: and commonly the Nobles gave out and said, That the Gods were not well pleased, that two commoners were then first chosen consuls: whereupon in the room of Marcellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus was chosen consul the third time. Thus write Livy and Plutarch. And for this cause it is that Cassiodorus, Orosius, and Entropius do put down for this years consuls, T. Sempronius and Q. Fabius.

540 Q. Fabius, IV. M. Claudius Marcellus, III.

Livy, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus, set out for consuls this year, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time. Moreover, Cicero oftentimes and Frontinus in his second book of stratagems, make mention of these consuls.

541 Q. Fabius Max. son of Verrucosus, T. Sempronius Gracchus, II.

Against this year were both the consuls created in their absence, namely, Q. Fab. Max. the son of Verrucosus, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time: as Livy testifieth and Cassiodorus, together with the Sicilian registers. This Fabius had been Pretor the former year: and Gracchus consul two years before. These consuls Gallius nominateth out of Quadrigarius, the second book and second chapter. Likewise Cicero and Valerius, 542 App. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, III.

The consuls created for this year by the Dictator, were Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the third time, who then was master of the horse-men, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who in his his pretorship was L. deputy in Sicily, as Livy, Plutarch in Fabius, Cassiodorus, and Festus in his 17 book do witness.

C. Sulpitius Galba, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Upon the receipt of certain letters, the Consuls agreed together, that Claudius should hold the election for magistrates and see it finished, while Fulvius remained still before Capua. Claudius created for consuls, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and P. Sulpitius son of Servius, and surnamed Galba, who before time had born no state-office of the chair. Thus writeth Livy. The same consuls also Cassiodorus doth deliver. Orosius likewise and Festus in his 17 book. The Sicilian records declare Galba and Centumalus. As for S. Sulpitius, he is named in his second consulship, as it appeareth upon record in the capitol, the son of Servius, nephew of Publius surnamed Galba Maximus.

M. Val. Lavinius. II. M. Claudius Marcellus. IV.

Livy, Sextus Pompeius, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch, Florus, Entropius, and Orosius, do present for consuls this year, M. Claudius Marcellus and M. Valerius Lavinius. Now this is Marcellus his fourth consulship, as Plutarch and Livy write: but Cassiodorus saith, that he was but the third time with M. Valerius Lavinius, leaving out that consulship which he bare not through, because of the error in his creation: and yet is it one of the five that he is reported to have born. Livy in the nine and twentieth and thirtieth books, writeth that M. Valerius was twice consul. In like manner, the book of Cassian hath for this year, Marcellus the fourth time, and Lavinus the second time. And therefore Orosius supposeth that his first consulat was in the year five hundred four-and-thirty: and his second, now. Of him Polybius and Cicero make mention.

Q. Fabius Maximus. V.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus. IV.

The consuls for this year created, were Q. Fabius the fifth time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the fourth time, the same man who being Dictator, held the assembly for that election: as Livy and Cassiodorus do witness. The Sicilian records set forth Fabius and Flaccus. While these were consuls, Cicero in his Oration against Reblius, saith that Capua was won: and yet Livy hath reported it two years before. Of these consuls Valerius also, together with Plutarch, Entropius, and Orosius, have made mention.

M. Claudius Marcellus. V.
T. Quintius Crispinus.

In the eleventh year of the Pubick war, there entered into their consulship, M. Marcellus the fifth time (so ye reckon that consulship which upon an error in the creation he kept not) and T. Quintius Crispinus. So saith Livy. Plutarch also nameth Marcellus the fifth time and Crispinus. But Cassiodorus reckoneth Marcellus but the fourth time with Crispinus, passing over that faulty consulat of his. Moreover these consuls are mentioned by Cicero Valerius, Plinius the younger, Probus, Entropius, and Orosius: who also report that they both were forelaid and intrapped in ambush by Annibal: in so much as Marcellus was presently slain in the place, and Quintius fled sore wounded.

547

C. Claudius Nero.
M. Livius Salinator.

When the LL. of the Senat cast about to see whom they should create consuls, behold, the most eminent and singular man above all others, was C. Claudius Nero: unto whom was joined as companion in government M. Livius, who many years before, upon a consulat that he had born, was by the judgment of the people condemned: and almost eight years after his condemnation was by Marcus Marcellus, and Marcus Livius then consuls, reduced into the city. In like manner, the Sicilian Registers name for consuls, Nero and Salinator. The capitol records shew Caius Claudius Nero, with M. Livius Salinator.

548
Q. Caelius Metellus.
L. Veturius Philo.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the records of the capitol, exhibit unto us for consuls this year, L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Caelius Metellus. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Philo. Over and besides, of these consuls Cicero many a time and often, Valerius, Plutarch in Africanus, Appianus in Ibericus, Pliny in his 7 book 43 chap. do make mention.

549

P. Cornelius Scipio.
P. Licinius Crassus.

Livius, Veturius Philo held the assembly for creation of Magistrate, wherein all the centuries in general, with exceeding great favour nominated Publius Scipio for consul, and to him was joined in government, P. Licinius Crassus, the supream pontify. Thus saith Livy. The Sicilian tables have Scipio with Crassus. The capitol records shew P. Cornelius Scipio.

Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, with P. Licinius Crassus the rich, of whom Cassiodorus likewise and Cicero in Brutus do speak.

M. Cornelius Cethegus, P. Sempr. Tuditanus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do name for Consuls this year, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The Sicilian registers, Cethegus and Tuditanus, of whom Cicero in Brutus, Plutarch, Entropius and Cassiodorus do often times make mention. In this year P. Scipio Nasica, judged by the Senate the best man in the city, received dame Idas.

Cn. Servilius Capio, C. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus together, with the Sicilian records and capitol monuments, put unto us for Consuls, Cn. Servilius Capio and C. Servilius. Of which twain Capio had been Pretor in the year 548, and Servilius in 547. This year died Q. Fabius Max. and Annibal with a sad cheer and heavy heart departed out of Italy into Africa by commandment of certain delegate Embassadors, in the seventeenth year of the second Punick war.

552

Tib. Claudius Nero, M. Servilius Geminus.

M. Arcus Servilius Geminus, and Tib. Claudius Nero were Consuls this year according to Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records, in which Servilius standeth surnamed Pulex Geminus. The Sicilian tables have Nero with Servilius. In these Consuls year, Annibal was in Africa by Scipio overthrown, and a second peace made with the Carthaginians, as Polybius, Livy, Plutarch, Appian, and Entropius do report.

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Aelius Patrus.

Against this year were created Consuls, as Livy writeth, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Patrus. So saith Cassiodorus also and Pliny in his eighteenth book and eighteenth chapter. In a broken peece of marble in the Capitol, we find Lentulus and P. Aelius: in the Sicilian registers, Lentulus and Patrus. These two were Pretors both in the year 550.

P. Sulpitius Galba, C. Aurelius Cotta.

Livy and Cassiodorus put down for Consuls, P. Sulpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. This P. Sulpitius in the year 542 was first Consul; and C. Cotta two years before, Pretor. These same Consuls are to be seen in the capitol tables, but Galba and Cotta in the Sicilian.

L. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Villius Tappulus.

This year had for Consuls, L. Cornelius and P. Villius, as Cassiodorus writeth: but according to Livy and the capitol monuments, Lentulus and Tappulus: after the Sicilian records, L. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus. Of P. Villius Consul, Plutarch maketh mention in Quintus.

T. Quintus Flaminius, Sext. Aelius Patrus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol records, together with Plutarch in Quintus, report unto us for consuls this year, T. Quintus Flaminius and Sext. Aelius Patrus. The Sicilian tables, Flaminius and Patrus. Pliny in his book of famous men, saith (but not without some error) that this Flaminius was the son of that C. Flaminius who was slain at Thrasymenus. Whereas in deed this man was descended of the noble Patritian house of the Quintii, the other of the family of Flaminius, no better than commoners. Now this Sext. Aelius Patrus is the man of whom Cicero giveth this report out of the poet Ennius:

*This Sextus Aelius in records, Carus surnam'd ye see,
A worthy wight for wisdom rare, a discreet man was be.*

And therefore in the capitol tables he is called Patrus Carus.

C. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Minutius Rufus.

In this year C. Cornelius Cethegus, and Q. Minutius were consuls, after Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol marbles. Their surnames only appear in the Sicilian registers. And Cicero speaketh of them in Brutus.

558

L. Furius Purpureo, M. Claudius Marcellus.

This year had for Consuls, L. Furius Purpureo, and M. Claudius Marcellus, according to Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records. The Sicilian annals deliver unto us Porphyrus and Marcellus.

M. Porcius Cato, L. Valerius Flaccus.

M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius are ranged Consuls this year, by Verrius Flaccus, Cicero in many places, Livy, Plutarch, Pliny, Valerius, Probus, Entropius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus.

560

P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, II,
T. Sempronius Longinus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, the monuments both of the capitol and Sicily, match Consuls together this year, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the second second time, and T. Sempronius Longus. Of them Cicero maketh mention in the oration of Cornelius accused of felony, appeareth in Padianus.

L. Cornelius Murena, Q. Minutius Thermus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol authors, write that the Consuls chosen to succeed in this year were L. Cornelius Murena, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The said surnames are found in the Sicilian records. Probus speaketh of them in Annibal, and Frontinus in his book of stratagems.

562

L. Quinctius Flaminius, C. Domitius Enobarbus.

L. Quinctius Flaminius, and C. Domitius Enobarbus were this years Consuls, as Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol records testify. The Sicilian registers also shew their surnames.

M. Acilius Glabrio, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

The Consuls created for this year, were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and M. Acilius Glabrio, son of Cn. as testify Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol records, Plutarch in Quintus, and Appian in his Syriack history. In the Sicilian registers, named they are Glabrio and Nasica. In these Consuls year the same authors report, that the war against Antiochus King of Syria, and against the Etolians, was proclaimed: which in the capitol monuments, in Paterculus, and Macrobius, is called the Antiochian, but by Florus and Pliny the younger in Cato, the Syrian war. This was the 562 year from the cities foundation, as Macrobius writeth in his first book of Saturnals.

L. Cornelius Scipio, C. Laelius.

Cassiodorus, Livius, and the capitol tables put down for Consuls this year, L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Laelius. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Laelius. The same men Gellius in his sixteenth book and fourth chapter nameth C. Laelius son of C. and L. Scipio, son of P. To Laelius Cassiodorus only addeth the surname Africanus. This L. Scipio surnamed Africanus, was brother to Africanus.

565

C. Manlius Vulso, M. Fulvius Nobilior.

C. Manlius Vulso, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, are nominated Consuls for this year by Livy, Cassiodorus, and the tables both of the capitol and Sicily. Manlius was Pretor in this year 557 and Fulvius anno 560.

C. Livius Salinator, M. Valerius Messala.

The Consuls next following, were M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, as Livy and Cassiodorus testify, together with the Sicilian and capitol tables.

M. Emilius Lepidus, C. Flaminius.

The next Consuls, were M. Emilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius, as witness Livy, Cassiodorus, Strabo in his first book, the Sicilian and capitol tables. Of them Valerius maketh mention in his first book. This is that Emilius, who was the Arch-Magist, twice Consul, Censor, and President of the Senat six times chosen by the Censors. And this is that C. Flaminius, who afterward by Cato the Censor was displaced out of the Senat and disrobed.

568

Sp. Posthumius Albinus, Q. Martius Philippus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, Strabo, and the capitol tables report Consuls for this year, Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Martius Philippus. The Sicilian Registers name them barely, Albinus and Philippus. Valerius maketh mention of them in his first book and third chapter. Likewise Pliny in his 35 book and tenth chapter.

569

Ap. Claudius Pulcher, M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

For this years Consuls were Appius Claudius Pulcher, & M. Sempronius Tuditanus, as Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol records do testify. They stand in the Sicilian records by the names of Pulcher and Tuditanus.

F. Claudius Pulcher, L. Porcius Cicinius.

The Consuls that followed for this year, were L. Porcius Cicinius & P. Claudius Pulcher: witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables. Pulcher and Cicinius they be called in the Sicilian records.

Q. Fabius Labeo, M. Claudius Marcellus.

Against this year were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius Labeo, according to Livy, Cassiodorus, & the capitol marble stones. Their surnames be found also in the Sicilian tables. Whiles these were consuls, Asinius wrote that Annibal died, as Probus maketh report in Annibal.

L. Emilius Paulus, Cn. Babius Tamphilus.

C. Natus Babius Tamphilus and L. Emilius Paulus were created Consuls for this year, as Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol, yea, and the Sicilian tables do testify, although these last have regard only of their surnames. This L. Emilius is the son of that L. Emilius, who was slain at Cannae, as Plutarch and Velleius do witness.

P. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Babinus Tamphilus.

Publius Cornelius Cethegus and M. Babinus Tamphilus succeeded Consuls this year, after Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol tables. Cethegus and Tamphilus they be called in the Sicilian records. Of P. Cornelius and M. Babinus consuls Plutarch made mention in Numeri. Q. Fabius Cunctator and M. Babinus Tamphilus Valerius speaketh in his first book and first chapter. Of P. Cornelius Livy and M. Babinus Tamphilus in 11 book and first chapter. But Livy in his 13 book and 13 chapter calleth the one P. Cornelius Cethegus, son of Lucius; and the other M. Babinus son of Q. (surnamed Tamphilus).

A. Posthumius Albinus, C. Calpurnius Piso.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments exhibit unto us for this year Consuls: A. Posthumius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso. The Sicilian tables, Albinus and Piso anno 567. Pretor in the year 567. And Albinus anno 568. But when as a pestilence had reigned now three years, so as it dispeopled the City of Rome and all Italy, it happened that C. Calpurnius died, not without suspicion that he was murdered by Q. Hortensius; in whose room Q. Fulvius Flaccus his father in law, or mothers husband, was declared Consul.

575

L. Manlius Acidinus, Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records shew for Consuls this year, L. Manlius Acidinus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The Sicilian tables, Acidinus with Flaccus. Cicero maketh mention of Acidinus Consul, in his second book of a perfect orator. Also observed it is in the capitol monuments, that these Consuls were german brethren: and the same hath Valleius in his second book reported. And thereby it cometh to pass, that in the capitol tables L. Manlius Acidinus, is surnamed also Fulvianus after the manner of those that are adopted.

M. Junius Brutus, A. Manlius Vulsus.

Next Consuls created, were M. Junius Brutus and A. Manlius Vulsus: as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do testify. Brutus and Vulsus they be named in the Sicilian monuments. This Brutus was Pretor in the year 562, and Vulsus in 571.

C. Claudius Pulcher, T. Sempronius Gracchus.

Claudius Pulcher and T. Sempronius Gracchus, the twelfth Consuls this year by Plutarch, Livy, and Cassiodorus. Of this T. Gracchus Cicero speaketh in his first book of divination, and Frontinus in his first of strategem,

C. Cornelius Scipio Africanus,
Q. Perillius,
C. Valerius Lavinius.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records exhibit unto us for Consuls, C. Cornelius Scipio Africanus and Q. Perillius. The Sicilian records, Scipio and Perillius. But when as Scipio returned out of the town of Ardea, full of wounds, Q. Perillius and M. Babinus Tamphilus whereupon he went to the Capitol Capitolium, where, by reason that his disease grew upon him, he departed this life; Q. Perillius the other Consul, created for his companion to enter presently upon the government, C. Valerius Lavinius. Thus saith Livy.

579

P. Minus Scævola, M. Aemilius Lepidus II.

O Rufus putteth down for Consuls, P. Minus Scævola and M. Aemilius Lepidus II. The Sicilian tables, Lepidus and P. Minus. The capitol monuments, P. Minus Scævola and M. Aemilius Lepidus II. The election of the Consuls this year is lost in Livy. Cicero likewise writeth in his discourse of Provinces. Fulvius also in his first book and first chapter, that this M. Aemilius Lepidus was twice Consul.

Sp. Posthumius Albinus, Q. Minus Scævola.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Minus. The capitol records, Sp. Posthumius Albinus Paulus, and Q. Minus Scævola. Cicero maketh mention of these in his second book and 21 chapter. The election of the Consuls this year is lost in Livy.

L. Posthumius Albinus, M. Popilius Lanus.

The Consuls for this year created, were L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanus, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments do testify. Albinus and Lanus are put down in the Sicilian records. Whiles these were consuls, the feast Floralia was instituted first, as Ovid sheweth in his first book of his Kalendar.

C. Popilius Lanus, P. Aelius Ligus.

This year had for Consuls, C. Popilius Lanus, and P. Aelius Ligus; as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do testify. The Sicilian registers name them Lanus and Aelius. To this day had no Consul in one year been married together both commoners: and this was the first time, that both consuls were created out of the commons, as is observed in the capitol monuments. After this, you shall never find the consuls both Patricii commoners ye shall have them both twain, many a time and often: but most of all, a commoner and a Patrician, one with another.

P. Licinius Crassus, C. Cassius Longinus.

The Consuls next ensuing for this year, were P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus, as it appeareth in Livy, Cassiodorus, Orosius, and the capitol tables. For in the Sicilian records, they are named no otherwise than Crassus and Longinus. Of the very same Consuls Pliny maketh mention in his seventh book. Gellius also in his ninth book and fourth chapter. Whiles these were Consuls the people of Rome began war against Perseus King of the Macedonians, son of Philip: which Florus and Eutropius, together with Orosius, call the second Macedonian war: whereof Livy and Plutarch write more at large.

584
A. Hostilius Mancinus. A. Atilius Serranus.

Cassiodorus setteth next after for Consuls, C. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, Mancinus and Serranus. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Mancinus, and A. Atilius Serranus. As well the election of these Consuls as their acts, are missing in the Annals of Livy.

Q. Martius Philippus, II. Cn. Servilius Capio.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables match together in the Consulship of this year Q. Martius Philippus the second time, and Cn. Servilius Capio. The Sicilian catalogue hath barely Philip and Capio. Cicero in his books entituled Brutus and Cato, writeth that Ennius the Poet died in their Consulship.

L. Aemilius Paulus, II. C. Licinius Crassus.

The Consuls that next succeeded were L. Aemilius Paulus the second time (seventeen years after his first Consulship) and Cains Licinius Crassus: witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments. In like manner they are named in the Sicilian registers Paulus and Crassus. As touching this second Consulship of L. Paulus, Plutarch, Velleius, Orosius, Eutropius, Florus, and Justinus in his 33 book do write, Plutarch addeth thus much and saith, That Paulus was threescore years of age, when he was chosen Consul the second time.

Q. Elius Petus. M. Junius.

Livy bringeth in for Consuls next after, Q. Aemilius and M. Junius. The Sicilian records Paulus and Pennus. Obsequens and Cassiodorus Q. Elius Petus, and M. Junius Pennus. Cicero likewise in Brutus speaketh of Mar. Junius Pennus Consul with Q. Elius. Now from this year forward, we want the compleat story penned by Livy.

M. Marcellus. C. Sulpitius.

Livy and the capitol monuments shew for this years Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Sulpitius Gallus. Obsequens, and the title prefixed before the comedy Aspidia in Turenus, exhibit Mar. Marcellus and C. Sulpitius. This is that Marcellus, who, after he had been thrice Consul, perished in the sea. Nephew he was of that M. Marcellus, who had been five times Consul, as Padianus reporteth. Of these Consuls, Justinus, Pliny in his second book, and many other have made mention.

Cn. Octavius. T. Manlius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens infer Consuls this year, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius. The Sicilian tables, Octavius and Torquatus. The capitol stones, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius Torquatus. Mention there is made of these consuls in the title set before Hecyra in Terence. Cicero in his first book of Final ends, and likewise in many other places, speaketh of T. Torquatus, Consul with Cn. Octavius.

590
A. Manlius. Q. Cassius.

Cassiodorus matcheth together consuls in this year, A. Manlius and Q. Cassius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Torquatus and Longinus. The capitol records, A. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Cassius Longinus, who died in his consulship. These also had been companions together in their Pretorship, anno 586, as Livy beareth witness.

591
T. Sempronius. M. Inventius.

Cassiodorus saith, that the consuls this year were T. Sempronius and M. Inventius. Obsequens nameth them, T. Gracchus, and M. Inventius. The capitol monuments shew T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time, and M. Inventius Thalna. In the Sicilian registers, Dolabella and Thalna, but not well as it is to be doubted. Cicero, Valerius, and Plutarch have made mention of Tib. Gracchus twice consul. And that M. Inventius died whiles he was consul, Pliny in his seventh book, and Valerius also do report.

592
P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. C. Martius.

Cicero in his first and second book of the nature of Gods, Verrius Flaccus, Obsequens and Cassiodorus, report for consuls P. Cornel. Scipio Nasica and C. Martius Figulus. But for that there was an error committed in their creation, and thereupon they resigned up their place, as the foresaid authors witness together with Valerius Plutarch and Pliny: P. Corn. Lentulus, and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, entred in their stead.

593
M. Messala.

C. Fannius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, M. Messala and C. Fannius. The Sicilian Catalogue Messala and Strabo. The capitol records, and the title before Phormio in Terence represent unto us, M. Valerius Messala and Caius Fannius Strabo. Of these Consuls Suetonius maketh mention in his book of excellent Rhetoricians. Likewise in Cicero in Brutus, Pliny in his ninth book and fiftieth chapter, and Gelius in his second book.

594
L. Anicius. M. Cornelius Cethegus.

Cassiodorus and the title set before the Comedy Adelphi in Terence avouch for Cons. L. Anicius and M. Cornelius. The Sicilian and capitol records put surnames unto them, Gallus and Cethegus. Of Anicius the Consul, Cicero speaketh in Brutus; and of Cethegus, the six and fortieth Epitome or Breviary of Florus. In their year, it is for certain held, that L. Pactus who conquered Persens, died.

Cn. Cornelius Dolabella. M. Fulvius.

The year next following had Consuls, as witnesseth Cassiodorus, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian registers shew Dolabella and Fulvius. The capitol monuments, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and Mar. Fulvius Nobilior. The same is to be seen in the life of Terence the poet, for there it is written, that in their year he died.

N. Emylius. C. Popilius.

The Consuls next succeeding, were Marcus Emylius and C. Popilius, as Cassiodorus saith. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Lanus. The capitol records have M. Emylius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lanus the second time. Of the same, Suetonius maketh mention in his chapter of distinction of ages.

597
Sex. Julius. L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus reporteth, that the next Consuls were Sex. Julius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian and capitol tables yeeld surnames unto them, Caesar to Julius, and Orestes to Aurelius. Pliny writeth of them in his 33 book.

598

Obssequens and Cassiodorus record for this years Consuls L. Lentulus and C. Martius. The Sicilian catalogue Lentulus and Figulus. The capitol monuments, L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, and C. Martius Figulus the second time.

Cicero in Brutus speaketh of them both. And as touching Figulus twice Consul, Valerius writeth in his chapter of Wrath.

P. Scipio Nasica. M. Claudius.

Publius Scipio and M. Claudius are by Cassiodorus set down for Cons. The Sicilian registers have Nasica and Marcellus. The capitol records, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica the second time, and M. Claudius Marcellus likewise the second time. Padianus writeth, that this Marcellus was thrice Consul. And that Pub. Scipio Nasica, surnamed also Corculum, was twice Consul and Censor besides, Cicero writeth in his Brutus.

600
L. Posthumus. Q. Opimius.

This year had Consuls, L. Posthumus and Q. Opimius, as Cassiodorus and Obssequens do witness. The Sicilian tables shew Opimius and Albinus. But the capitol records Q. Opimius, and L. Posthumus Albinus. Mention there is made of this Q. Opimius, Consul, by Cicero in his Brutus; also in the Epitome of the seven and fortieth book. Moreover, that Posthumus died in his magistracy, besides Verrinus Flaccus, Obssequens also sheweth: in whose stead Man. Acilius Glabrio was chosen.

Q. Fulvius. T. Annius.

The Consuls next following, as Cassiodorus writeth, were Q. Fulvius and T. Annius. In the capitol fragments they are named Nobilior and T. Annius. In the Sicilian registers, Nobilior and Luscius. Cicero in his Brutus saith, that Q. Nobilior son of Marcus, and T. Annius Luscius were Consuls. The Greek records and Cyprian's book shew Nobilior and Luscius.

602
M. Marcellus. L. Valerius.

This year had for Consuls, M. Marcellus and L. Valerius as Cassiodorus witnesseth. The Sicilian catalogue representeth Marcellus and Flaccus. Obssequens exhibiteth unto us M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus. This Marcellus was thrice Consul, as Padian saith upon the Oration for Scannus, and Cicero in his book of divination and destiny.

603
L. Licinius Lucullus. A. Postumius Albinus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, L. Lucullus and A. Postumius. The Sicilian tables, Lucullus and Albinus. The broken marbles of the capitol, Lucullus and A. Postumius son of Anus, Orosius and the Epitome 48, shew L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Post. Albinus. Cicero in his Brutus, and Lucullus both, maketh mention of the same.

T. Quintius. M. Acilius.

THis year had for Consuls, L. Quintius and M. Acilius, as Cassiodorus testifieth in whom Pliny in his 7 book & 36 chap. calleth C. Quintius and M. Acilius. Cicero in his book Cato, and the 12 book of his Epistles to Atticus nameth T. Flaminius and M. Acilius, and saith that they were created Consuls in the 19 year after the death of Ennius. The Sicilian tables have Flaminius and M. Acilius Balbus.

605

L. Martius. M. Manilius.

C*assiodorus* avoucheth for the Consuls of this year, L. Martius and M. Manilius: likewise the 49 Epitome. Cicero in Lucullus maketh mention of Censorinus and M. Manilius: of Censorinus and Manilius in his twelfth book of epistles to Atticus. The same Consuls, Appianus in Libya nameth L. Martius Censorinus and M. Manilius. In like sort Censorinus in his treatise of Nativity or Birth-day. The Sicilian tables have Censorinus and Manilius. The capitol fragments shew Censorinus and M. Manilius, son of Publius, nephew of Pub. Whiles they were Consuls, there arose a third war between the State of Rome and the Carthaginians, as Florus in the 49 Epitome, besides Verrinus Flaccus do testify: likewise Sallustius, but that he saith with Verrinus Flaccus, that it was the year 64. Cicero also in his eleventh Philippick, and lastly Entropius, with Orosius.

Sp. Postumius. L. Piso.

Then were Consuls created, Sp. Postumius and L. Piso, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In the capitol fragments they are named A. Magnus, and Lu. Calpurnius, son of Caius, nephew of Caius, surnamed Piso (Casinius). In Cicero's Kalender, Magnus and Casinius, in the Sicilian catalogue Albinus and Piso. As for Magnus and Albinus, they be the surnames of Postumius: like as Casinius and Piso, of Calpurnius. In this year the people of Rome, entred into arms against Andriscus, otherwise termed Pseudo-Philippus, which they call the third Macedonian war, after Florus and Entropius.

P. Africanus. C. Livius.

O*bssequens* and Cassiodorus set forth for consuls this year P. Africanus and C. Livius. In the Sicilian catalogue they are registered Scipio and Drusus: in the capitol fragments Africanus Emylianus, and C. Livius; the one son of M. Emilius, nephew of Marcus, the other surnamed Drusus. This Pub. Cornelius was the natural son of that Publius that vanquished Perseus King of the Macedonians, and adopted by P. Cornelius the son of Scipio Africanus. Whereupon he was called Pub. Cornelius, son of Publius, nephew of P. Scipio Africanus the younger, and Emylianus, as Velleius and others do witness. His two last surnames are in the capitol records, out of which, the complete name of M. Livius Drusus, with his addition, was framed. Of these Consuls Cicero speaketh after: likewise Valerius, Pacronius, Appian, Plutarch, Florus, both Plinius, Entropius and Orosius.

C. Cornelius. L. Mummius.

NExt consuls following, were Cn. Cornelius and L. Mummius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus: and according to Orosius, Velleius, Censorinus, and Cicero in the thirteenth book of epistles to Atticus, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius they are named. In the Sicilian registers Lentulus and Mummius. In the fragments of the capitol, Lentulus and L. Mummius, nephew of Lucius. Lu. Mummius in this magistracy acquired the surname of Achaicus, upon a victory achieved by him in Achaia, as Plutarch in Marus, and Velleius do testify.

Q. Fabius Maximus. L. Hostilius.

C*assiodorus* this year delivereth unto us for Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus, together with L. Hostilius. Cicero in Laelius, and Pliny in his five and thirtieth book and fourth chapter, nameth them Qu. Maximus, brother of Scipio, and L. Mancinus. Of this Q. Fabius Maximus Emilius, Valerius writeth in his second book and first chapter. This Q. Fabius was the son of P. Emilius, adopted by Q. Fab. Max. the son of Verrucosus, as Appianus writeth in Hispanensis: and therefore in the fragment of a capitol table there is to be seen the second surname Emilius. Pliny was deceived, who in his 31 book 11 chapter calleth him Qu. Allobrogicus, brother of Scipio, who was the son of this Fabius.

Ser. Galba. L. Aurelius.

THis year had for Consuls, Ser. Galba and Lu. Aurelius, according to Cassiodorus: those, Valerius in his sixth book nameth S. Sulpitius Galba, and Lu. Aurelius Cotta, whom the Sicilian catalogue sheweth under the bare names of Galba and Cotta. But the capitol fragments have Galba and L. Valerius Cotta. This is that Sulp. Galba, who being Pretor, as Smetonius writeth, stirred up the war before against Viridius, for he was a vehement Orator, of whom Cicero speaketh many times. And as for L. Cotta, he it was whom afterwards being accused by Africanus, Qu. Metellus Macedonicus defended, Cicero in Brutus, for Murena and against Verrus, maketh mention of him. Likewise Frontinus of them both, in his first book of water-conduits.

Ap. Claudius. Q. Metellus.

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls Appius Claudius and Q. Metellus. Orofius, App. Claudius and Q. Caelius Maellus. The Sicilian registers have Claudius and Metellus. The capitol fragments shew Pulcher and Q. Caelius Macedonius. Of the same, Erominus speaketh in his book of water-conduits, and Valerius in his seventh book. Now this Metellus is he who being Pretor, subdued the Macedonians and Achaens, whereupon he was surnamed Macedonius: whom Plinius 7 book sheweth to be the son of L. and nephew of Q. M.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, L. Metellus and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian records, Me. ellus and Maximus. Orofius, L. Caelius Metellus and Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus. In like manner the capitol fragments Calvus and Servilianus. This Servilianus is the brother german of Q. Servilius Capius, the Consul two years after (as witnesseth Appian) and the adopted son of Q. Fabius Emylianus; for they were both adopted by Q. Fabius Max. the son of Verrucosus, the one out of the house Emylia, the other of Servilia. L. Metellus is the brother of Q. Metellus Macedonius, as writeth Valerius in his treatise of Witnesses.

Cn. Capius. Q. Pompeius.

Cneus Capius and Q. Pompeius are recounted Consuls by Cassiodorus. Velleius in his second book saith thus: Whether there were two or three houses of the Pompeies, the first of that name was Consul with Cn. Servilius. Of this Q. Pompeius, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes, writing that he was of base and obscure parentage. Him Valerius in his chapter of witnesses nameth Aufidius, but corruptly through the fault of the copiers, in stead of A. F. i. the son of Aulus. In the same sort Appianus in Hispanensis nameth him Q. Pompeius Aulus for A. Filius. Cicero in his Orations against Verres, and in that for Fonteius, Valerius also in his chapter of Witnesses, sheweth that there were two brethren named Cneus and Quintus, both Servilii Capiones.

Q. Capius. C. Lalius.

After this were Consuls made, Q. Capius and C. Lalius, my authors are Cassiodorus and Obsequens together with the Sicilian tables, and Frontinus in his treatise of water-conduits. This Lalius as Cicero in his eleventh Philippick, and Velleius do report, was the son of Lalius the the Consul, anno 564, whom as Cicero in his second book of Duties and in Lalius, was the first that was surnamed Wise, whereof Plutarch in Gracchi yeeldeth a reason.

Cn. Piso. M. Popilius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, Cn. Piso with M. Popilius. Appianus and the Epitomit have M. Popilius Lanas; but they be named M. Popilius Lanas and L. Calpurnius by Valerius in his first book, writing thus, That Cornelius Hispanus, Lord chief justice for strangers, when M. Popilius Lanas and L. Calpurnius were Consuls, by an edict commanded all the Chaldean [Astrologers] to depart out of Rome and Italy within ten daies next ensuing.

P. Scipio. D. Brutus.

Publius Scipio and D. Brutus are named for this years Cons. by Cassiodorus. Florus in his 55 Epitome; P. Cornelius Nasica (surnamed Serapion in mockery by C. Curianus a Trib. of the Com.) and D. Junius Brutus Cass. levied and mustered souldiers, &c. This Scipio was son of that Nasica who was surnamed Corculum, and twice was he Consul and Censor also; nephew to that Nasica, who by the Senat was deemed the best man in the City, and father to him that warred upon Jugurtha, as Velleius saith. This Decius Brutus, Cicero in his Brutus calleth the son of Marcus, who bare the Consulship in the year five hundred ninety seven, and in the capitol tables is called Pennus. Moreover, of these Consuls Cicero speaketh very oft, Valerius also in his 3 book, chap. 7. 3 book, chap. 3. 9 book, chap. 15: Likewise, Pliny in his 21 book, and lastly, Frantinus.

M. Emylius. C. Hostilius Mancinus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens match together in the consulship this year, M. Emylius, and C. Hostilius Mancinus. The Sicilian registers Lepidus and Mancinus. Orofius and Appian, M. Emylius Lepidus and C. Hostilius Mancinus. Of this Consul Mancinus there remain yet some tokens to be seen in broken marbles of the capitol. Cicero maketh mention oftentimes of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Brutus. Likewise, Valerius, Florus, Paterculus, and Pliny in his treatise of Famous men.

P. Furius. Sex. Attilius Serranus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, P. Furius and Sex. Attilius Serranus. Cicero in his third book of Duties, L. Furius and Sex. Attilius. Obsequens, L. Furius and Attilius Serranus. The Sicilian registers Philus and Serranus. Of this Furius, Cicero writeth thus in his Brutus: L. Furius Philus, was reputed for a man of very good language, and to have spoken more learnedly than others. In the capitol fragments there appeareth yet some shew of Serranus the Consul.

Ser. Fulvius. C. Calpurnius.

The next consuls are set down by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, Ser. Fulvius and C. Calpurnius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flaccus and Piso, Orosius nameth S. Fulvius Flaccus and C. Calpurnius Piso. The capitol fragments shew Piso as for Fulvius Flaccus the Consul, mention there is made of him in the Epitome 36. Appian also in his Illyrica speaks of him, and in Hispanensis of Calp. Piso.

620

P. Africanus. C. Fulvius Flaccus.

The year following had P. Africanus and C. Fulvius Flaccus for Cons. as it is written in Cassiodorus and Obsequens; But Scipio and Flaccus in the Sicilian catalogue. The same Flaccus the Capitol fragments do shew. Of this C. Fulvius, mention there is made also in the 56 Epitome; and of Africanus twice Consul, by Appian in Hispanensis, by Orosius, Florus, and Valerius in his eight book.

621

P. Mucius. L. Calpurnius.

This year had consuls, P. Mucius, and Lu. Calpurnius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers shew Scavola and Calpurnius. Velleius nameth P. Mucius Scavola and L. Calpurnius. Of these Consuls Pedrianus upon the Orations against Verres, maketh mention in these words: Scavola a right learned man in the Laws, was Consul with L. Piso, that year wherein Tib. Gracchus was killed. In the broken marbles of the capitol he standeth by the name of L. Calpurnius Piso, surnamed also Frugi, and that truly. For Cicero in one Oration against Verres and in another for Fonteinus writeth, that he was the first of the Pisones, called Frugi. This man, when he was Tribune or Provost of the Commons, made a law against the extortion of magistrates, when Martius and Manilius were consuls: he wrote also the annals of Rome, as Cicero testifieth in his book Brutus.

P. Popilius. P. Rupilius.

Against this year were consuls created, as Cassiodorus writeth, P. Popilius and P. Rupilius: after the Sicilian records Lands and Rupilius. Cicero maketh mention of them in his 13 book of Epistles to Atticus, and against Verres. Also in the capitol fragments we read of P. Popilius, son of Caius, and P. Rupilius son of P. and nephew of Publius. Velleius in his second book, nameth the consuls Rupilius and Popilius. Cicero in Lalins speaketh of Rupilius and Lands. And of P. Rupilius there is mention made in the Epitome or Breviary 59.

623

P. Crassus. L. Valerius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls this year, Pub. Crassus and Lu. Valerius. Crassus and Plinius in the Sicilian catalogue. L. Valerius Flaccus and Pub. Licinius Crassus, according to Cicero in his eleventh Philippick against Antony. Of this Consul Pub. Licinius Crassus, all they have spoken, who wrote of the war of Aristonicus. This P. Crassus surnamed Dives, by Cicero in his books of a perfect Orator, and in Brutus is called the brother of Scavola: whereupon Velleius in his second book nameth him Mutianus, betokening thereby that he was adopted out of the house of Mutius into the family of the Crassi. This man Gallius writeth in his first book and 23 chapt. to have been of all others the richest man, the noblest personage, and the most eloquent Orator, the deepest lawyer, and the supreme Bishop withal.

C. Claudius. M. Perpenna.

Appian Claudius and M. Perpenna are matched in the Consulat together this year by Obsequens and Cassiodorus. Cuspinians book and the Greek records, shew Lentulus and Perpenna. This Claudius haply was adopted into the family of the Cornelii. Moreover, Cicero in his third book of Laws, and in the Oration for Plancius, calleth this man C. Claudius. This also is confirmed by an old table of stone commonly known, wherein is to be seen this inscription, C. Claudius and M. Perpenna Cons. Which evidence Sigonius and Onuphrius following, named him C. Claudius and not Appian. Of this M. Perpenna as many as wrote the war of Aristonicus, have made mention, and namely, Valerius in his 3 book and 4 chapt. Velleius, Strabo, Orosius, and Entropius.

C. Sempronius. M. Aquilius.

This year had consuls, M. Aquilius and C. Sempronius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. But Aquilius and Tuditannus according to the Sicilian registers. C. Sempronius Tuditannus, and M. Aquilius, after Orosius. Cicero speaketh of them in his book of the nature of gods, and to his brother Quintus. Paterculus also in his second book. Strabo in his 14 book. Appian in his first book. And both of them are taken out of the triumph records in the capitol.

Cn. Octavius. T. Annius.

Next followed as consuls Cn. Octavius and T. Annius, as Cassiodorus testifieth and none but he. For Cuspinians book and the Sicilian catalogue have Octavius and Rufus. Plutarch also writeth, that one T. Annius contended with Tib. Gracchus in a sedition. As for this C. Octavius, vins,

vinus, son he was to that Cneus who was Consul in the year five hundred eighty nine.

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls, L. Cassius and L. Cinna. The Sicilian records Longinus and Cinna. Cassianus books set out Rulla, corruptly for Ravilla, and Cinna. This L. Cassius was his son who bare the consulship in the year 590, and he was afterwards Censor in the year 629 surnamed Ravilla by Frontinus.

618
M. Emilius. L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens reckon for Coss. this year, M. Emilius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Orestes. Censorinus hath M. Emilius Lepidus, and L. Aurelius Orestes. Cicero in Brutus, M. Lepidus, and L. Orestes.

629
M. Plautius. M. Fulvius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens avouch Consuls this year, M. Plautius and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian registers, Hypsus and Flaccus. Orosius and Frontinus in his treatise of water-conduits, M. Plautius Hypsus and M. Fulvius Flaccus. Valerius also in his discourse of Pride maketh mention of them.

C. Cassius Longinus. C. Sextius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens report, that the consuls following were C. Cassius Longinus, and C. Sextius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Longinus and Calvinus. Velleius writeth, that the colony Fabrateria was planted by Cassius and Calvinus. Cicero in Brutus speaketh of C. Sextius Calvinus. Entropius declareth for consuls, C. Cassius Longinus, and S. Domitius Calvinus, not without suspicion of a fault or error.

Q. Caelius. T. Quintius.

Cassiodorus nominateth for consuls this year, Q. Caelius and T. Quintius. The Sicilian records Metellus and Flaminius. Entropius and Orosius, Q. Caelius Metellus and T. Quintius Flaminius. Cicero in his Oration pleading for his house, calleth them T. Flaminius and Q. Metellus. This Q. Metellus was the eldest of the four sons of Macedoniens, whom Plutarch in his treatise of the Romans fortune, calleth Q. Metellus Balearicus, of the Balears whom in this magistracy he conquered.

632
Cn. Domitius. C. Fannius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens join in fellowship of the consulate this year, Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and Fannius. Cicero writeth of them in his Brutus, and Pliny in his second book and 32 chapter. Three moons (qd. he) appeared when Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius were Coss. which most men called the night-stars.

This year had for consuls, L. Opimius and Q. Maximus, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Opimius and Maximus. But Obsequens, L. Opimius and Q. Fabius Maximus. Pliny speaketh of them in his second book, saying, About the sun there appeared an arch or bow, when L. Opimius and Q. Fabius were consuls. This Q. Fabius Maximus is by Cicero in Brutus, Florus in his Epitome, Velleius in his 2 book, and Padianus upon the Orations against Verrus, rightly named the nephew of Paulus, and son of F. Emilianus. And so may Strabo, Appian, and Pliny be well reproved, for making him and his father Emilianus, all one. The same man, as Cicero and Pliny testify, was surnamed Allobrogicus, upon a victory over the Allobroges. Of this L. Opimius consul, after whose name there was a wine called Opimianum, Pliny maketh mention in his 14 book and 4 chap. Plutarch also in C. Gracchus, and Velleius in his second book.

P. Manlius. C. Papyrius.

Cassiodorus inferreth for this years consuls, P. Manlius and C. Papyrius. The Sicilian records Manlius and Carbo. This is that Caius Papyrius Carbo, who being a Tribune of the commons when Claudius and Perpenna were Coss. was afterwards by C. Gracchus appointed for one of the Triumvirs to divide lands: who first took part with the commons, but afterwards ranged with the nobility: of whom Cicero in many other places, and namely, in his second book of a perfect Orator, maketh mention.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens put down for consuls, L. Caelius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue, Metellus and Cotta. Plutarch in Marius speaketh of C. Metellus and Cotta, consuls. Which Marius he writeth to have born the Tribuneship of the commons, when these were consuls, and to have cast Metellus the consul into prison. This is that Cotta, in whose consular room Velleius reporteth, that C. Caesar Flaminius of Jupiter, was created.

636
M. Cato. Q. Martins.

This year had for consuls M. Cato and Q. Martins: witness Cassiodorus and Obsequens. Cato and Martins, according to the Sicilian registers. But Entropius nameth them M. Porcius Cato and Q. Martins. Valerius speaketh of of them in his fift book, and Pliny in his second book 31 chap. Gellius also in his 13 book and 19 chap.

Consuls next ensuing by Cassiodorus his report were L. Caelius and Q. Metellus. After the Sicilian registers Metellus and Scorilla were by Europius, L. Caelius, Metellus and Q. Metellus. Now is this that L. Caelius Metellus, who after was upon subduing the Dalmatians, was surnamed Dalmatius, whom Plutarch in Coriolanus and in his book of the Roman fortune, nameth Diadematus, for that a long time he bound up his forehead with a wreath of wreath which they call a diadem, to hide an ulcer that he had there. Hereupon, when Pompeius bound up his leg with a white band or garter, it makes no matter, qd. Plutarch, in what part of the body a man wearth the diadem upbraiding and reproaching him for his Kinglike power, in terming a small chere of pece of cloth by that name. This is that Q. Metellus Scorilla the Augur, of whom Cicero in his book Laelius, and in the first book of an Orator maketh mention.

C. Licinius Geta, Q. Maximus.

Cassiodorus completh together in society of Consulship this year, C. Licinius and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian registers name them Geta and Eburinus. Of this Q. Maximus Cicero speaketh in his Oration for Mar. Anna. That this man was of the house of the Fabii, his surname Eburinus sheweth; of whom writeth Festus in this manner. Qu. Fabius was called Pallus Jovis, surnamed Eburinus, of whitenesse, for that his buttock was blasted with lightning. Quintilian in his third Declamation reporteth, that this Fab. Eburinus had a son unchast of his body, whom he examined at home in his house, and thereupon put him to death. The same man Valerius calleth Qu. Fabius Servilius. As for the name of this Licinius his father, obscure and unknown heretofore, Gellius out of an old antiquity of coin hath restored it, wherein, as he saith, was written plainly, C. Licinius Geta son of Publius.

M. Metellus, M. Scaurus.

The consuls next following by Cassiodorus his report, were M. Metellus and M. Scaurus. As for Metellus, the third son he was of Macedonius. But as touching M. Scaurus, whom the writer of the book entituled of famous persons, calleth M. Emilius, Scaurus, thus writeth Valerius, M. Scaurus (qd. he) was a Patrician indeed and of noble blood, but so, as the gentry of his house, for those descents before him lay obscure, for neither father, nor grandfire, by reason of their poor estate, and for want of putting forth themselves in the world, attained to dignity in weal publick. Moreover, of him Cicero maketh mention oftentimes in his Oration for Murena and in Brutus. Valerius also in his 3 book and 8 chap. and Pliny likewise in his 2 book and 36 chap.

Cassiodorus setteth down for consuls this year, M. Atilius Balbus and C. Cato. The Sicilian catalogue Balbus and Cato. Obsequens M. Atilius and C. Porcius. Of the same consuls Pliny speaketh in the 2 book, chap. 29. and 58. Plutarch in Marinus giveth to Atilius the surname Mantus. This C. Cato is the brother of that M. Cato, who four years before was Consul, nephew to M. Cato Conforinus, and Africani sister son, as saith Velleius, Cicero against Parricid, and in Brutus.

C. Caelius, Cn. Papyrius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens set down for next Consuls, C. Caelius and Cn. Papyrius. The Sicilian registers Metellus and Carbo. Europius, C. Caelius Metellus, and Cn. Carbo. The same men Tacitus in his book of the manners of Germans reported to have born the Consulship, anno 640 after the foundation of Rome: in which year, both he and Obsequens do report, that the people of Rome began first to war with the Cimbrians and the Teutones. This C. Metellus was the fourth son of C. Metellus the son of Macedonius: whom, when he died, he left a may of Pretors calling, and in suit and election for to be Consul. This man gat a surname by way of reproach, as Cicero testifieth in his second book of a perfect Orator. Now surnamed was he Capriarius, as Plutarch saith in the Life of the Romans.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth unto us for this years Consuls, M. Livius Drusus and L. Piso. The Sicilian catalogue Drusus and Piso. L. Piso surnamed Casarius a man of Consular degree, was slain after by the Tigurini, when Ln. Cassius was Consul, as Quintus testifieth.

Cassiodorus nameth this year for Consuls, P. Scipio and L. Calpurnius Bestia. The Sicilian records Nasica and Bestia. Obsequens, Pub. Scipio and L. Calpurnius. Salustius, Europius, and Orosius, P. Scipio Nasica and L. Calpurnius Bestia. Of these Consuls, P. Nasica Scipio and L. Bestia, Valerius likewise maketh report, lib. 1. chap. 6. Moreover, Cicero in his Brutus writeth that P. Scipio the son of Pub. Scipio surnamed Serapion and fellow Consul to L. Bestia, died in his Consulship. Of this Bestia there is some mention to be seen in a capitol fragment.

Sp. Posthumius. M. Minutius.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Sp. Posthumius and M. Minutius. The Sicilian registers Albinus and Rufus. Salust, Sp. Albinus and Q. Minutius Rufus. Of M. Minutius, Velleius and the threecore and seventh Epitome make mention.

645
Q. Metellus. M. Silanus.

Cassiodorus saith that the Consuls next following were Q. Metellus and M. Silanus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Metellus and Silanus. Padiannus and Entropius; Q. Caelius Metellus Numidicus, and M. Junius Silanus. Of them also Cicero speaketh in Brutus. This Metellus was surnamed Numidicus for the conquest of Numidia, as witnesseth Velleius.

Ser. Galba. M. Scaurus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens deliver for the Consuls of this year, Servius Galba and M. Scaurus. The Sicilian evidences, Salpustius and Scaurus. Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius, saith that S. Galba was a man of Consular degree, when Marius was the sixt time Consul. Of M. Scaurus the Consul, Velleius and Tacitus make mention. This is that M. Aurelius Scaurus, who being afterwards in embassage, was by the Cimbrians murdered, as appeareth in the threecore and seventh Epitome.

647

Cassiodorus joineth in the consulship this year, L. Cassius and C. Marius. Cuspinians book and the Sicilian records, Longinus and Marius. Pliny also maketh mention of them in his 10 book and 13 chap. Cicero in his oration for Plancius: Plutarch in Marius; and Cicero again in his third book of Duties, writeth, that C. Marius having taken the repulse twice for the office of Edileship, was created consul.

Q. Servilius Capio. C. Atilius.

Obsequens and Cassiodorus match consuls together this year, Q. Servilius Capio and C. Atilius Serranus. The Sicilian monuments Capio and Serranus. In this year upon the third day of January, M. Tullius Cicero was born, as Gellius in his fifteenth book and eight and twentieth chap. hath left written. Much mention there is made of these consuls in Cicero and other ancient writers.

649
P. Rutilius Rufus. C. Manilius.

Publius Rutilius Rufus and C. Manilius, are put down by Obsequens and Cassiodorus for this years consuls. This P. Rutilius, Cicero in Brutus, calleth the son of Marcus. About the other consul the Annals do vary and disagree; some forename him C. others Cnaeus. Some name him M. Manilius, others Mallius or Manlius. But all this controversy is decided by an old antiquity in Rome at Puerolis: the inscription whereof testifieth that P. Rutilius and C. Mallius were Consuls; as also the evidence of the Sicilian registers, wherein writeth it is Rufus and Mallius. Of this Mallius mention there is made in Cicero's Orations for Plancius and Marana: likewise in Valerius, Salust, Tacitus, Flarus, Entropius and Orosius. That he was not only a base man and of low birth but also without all vertue and win, in the course of his life also vile and contemptible, Cicero writeth in his Oration for Plancius: Whereby it easily appeareth, that the Mallii were a kindred different from the Manlii. For of Cn. Manlius a Patritian, and that of a most noble house, Cicero would never have spoken in such terms.

C. Marius II. C. Flavius Fimbria.

The next Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus, C. Marius the second time, and C. Flavius Fimbria: by Obsequens, C. Marius, and C. Flavius. By the Sicilian registers Marius and Fimbria: by Padiannus upon the Oration for Cornelius, C. Marius the second time, and C. Fimbria; Item, C. Marius and Caius Flavius. Besides, Cicero, Velleius, Valerius, Plutarch, and others speak often of these Cons.

C. Marius III. L. Aurelius Orestes.

Cassiodorus reporteth for this years Consuls, C. Marius the third time, and L. Aurelius Orestes. The Sicilian catalogue Marius and Orestes. Moreover, Marius even in his absence was elected Consul the third time, for fear of the Cimbrian war which was defeated, as Velleius, Entropius, the Breviary, and Cicero in his Oration concerning Provinces, do testify.

652
C. Marius IV. Q. Lutatius.

Next after them are put down for Consuls by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, C. Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers exhibit unto us Marius and Catulus, Plutarch and Entropius, Caius Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius Catulus. Of these Consuls, Cicero and Pliny oftentimes make mention.

C. Marius. P. Aquilius.

Then succeeded in the Consulship by the testimony of Cassiodorus, C. Marius the first time, and P. Aquilius. Of this C. Marius five times now Consul, Plutarch and Florus give report. And Cicero in his second book of a perfect Orator, nameth M. Aquilius for the companion of C. Marius in his first consulship. Of whom Plutarch in Marius speaketh and calleth him Marius Aquilius, as also Appian in Mithridaticus. Now this Marius Aquilius a Cornelian man, is the same who afterwards being an Embassador, was by King Mithridates taken prisoner, and most villanously tormented and mangled.

C. Marius VI. L. Valerius Flaccus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens shew unto us for this years consuls, C. Marius the sixth time, and L. Valerius Flaccus. The Sicilian records, Marius and Flaccus. This L. Flaccus (afterwards Censor) was President of the Senat, and matter of the horsemen under Sylla Dictator. Of these consuls Cicero speaketh very often, and namely, in his Brutus in his oration for Rabirius, against Calpurnius and Antonius; and also in the defence of Plancius. Pliny likewise in his second book, Fabius, and Padianus upon the oration against Piso. Moreover, Plutarch, and many authors besides. In this year (upon the twelfth day of July, then called Quintilis, as Macrobius witnesseth) was C. Caesar born, who afterwards was surnamed Dictator.

M. Antonius. A. Postumius.

Reported it is by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, that M. Antonius and A. Postumius were Consuls this year. The Sicilian registers, shew Albinus and Antonius. In a fragment also of the capitol marbles, mention there is of A. Postumius. Cuspinians book and the Greek records, have Antonius and Albinus. Of these Consuls, Cicero speaketh in his oration to the citizens of Rome, after his return out of exile. Likewise, Pliny in his 8 book and 7 chap. where he noteth this the 655 year. Also Gellius in his 4 book and 6 chap.

Q. Metellus. T. Didius.

Quintus Metellus, and T. Didius succeeded consuls next in this year, as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do write. And Padianus upon the oration for Cornelius, nameth them: Curio (saith he) accused Q. Metellus Nepos, son of Balearicus, and nephew of Macedonius, who was Consul with T. Didius. Cicero speaketh of the same man in his oration after his return.

657
Cn. Lentulus. P. Crassus.

Not only Cassiodorus, but the Sicilian registers also, do testify, that Cn. Lentulus and P. Crassus were Consuls this year: and Obsequens nameth them; Cn. Cornelius and P. Lentulus. Pliny writeth of them in his tenth book and first chape, also in his 33 book and second chapter.

658
Cn. Domitius. C. Cassius.

This year had for Consuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Cassius, as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do witness. Cuspinians annals and the Greek registers shew Enobarbus and Langius. A fragment of P. Flaccus his marbles, Enobarbus and C. Cassius son of Lucius. Padianus speaketh of them upon the oration for Cornelius.

Lucius Crassus and Q. Scavola were consuls next following, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In a fragment of the capitol records as touching Consuls, is to be seen Crassus and Mutius. In Censorinus, we find L. Lucinius son of Lucius. Cicero in his Brutus writeth, that Crassus the orator bare all dignities of magistracy, together with Scavola the high-priest, except the Tribunat of commons and the Censorship: also that while they two were Consuls, Q. Hortensius pleaded the first cause that ever he undertook, at the bar, Padianus upon the oration of Cicero for Cornelius, maketh mention of L. Lucinius Crassus the Orator, and Q. Mutius Scavola the arch-bishop, an orator besides and a professed lawyer, both Consuls together.

C. Calpurnius. L. Domitius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens declare for this years Consuls, C. Calpurnius and L. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Calpurnius and Enobarbus. In a capitol fragment, they are Calpurnius and L. Domitius son of Cn. As for Calpurnius it is the surname of Calpurnius. For Velleius maketh mention of one C. Calpurnius, under Augustus. In like manner Cicero in his book entitled, The thing for a Consulship and in his oration for Murena: Also Padianus upon the oration for Cornelius. Again, Cicero in his Brutus, nameth them next before Herennius.

C. Valerius Flaccus. M. Herennius.

There are matched by Cassiodorus and Obsequens for consuls this year, C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius. The Sicilian records, Flaccus and Herennius. A broken stone of the capitol, hath Flaccus and M. Herennius. Pliny in his 39 book and 3 chap. Cicero also in his Oration for Murena, and in Brutus, speaketh of them.

C. Claudius Pulcher. M. Perperna.

Consuls this year, were C. Claudius Pulcher, and M. Perperna, as witness Cassiodorus and Osegius. Likewise in a capitol broken monument, and in the Sicilian register, it is Pulcher and M. Perperna. Cicero maketh mention of this Claudius as Pretor of Sicily in the fourth Oration against Verres; and as Edile Curule in his second book of Offices. So doth Pliny in his 8 book.

Cassiodorus and Osegius name for consuls this year, L. Marius and Sex. Julius. The Sicilian records, Philip and Caesar. Eutropius and Orosius Sex. Julius Caesar, and L. Marius Philippi. A capitol fragment, Philip and Sex. Julius son of Caius. Pliny speaketh of them in his 2 book 8 chapt. also in the 33 book and 3 chapt. In like manner Cicero many times, and Valerius.

L. Julius Caesar. P. Rufinus Lupus.

According to Cassiodorus and Osegius the Consuls this year were L. Julius Caesar, and P. Rufinus Lupus. And so it is in Padianus Felicius, and the 79 Epitome: as also in other authors who have written of the Marian war. In a fragment of the capitol they are seen written, Caesar, and P. Rufinus son of Rufus. In the Sicilian records Caesar and Lupus. Cicero in his book of Divination, speaketh of them both: and in his oration for Plancius he writeth, that L. Caesar, missing of an Edileship became a Consul.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year, L. Portius and Cn. Pompeius. Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius surnamed Cn. Pompeius Serratus and L. Porcius Cato. The Capitol fragment shew no more but Serratus and Cato. Appian hath made mention of these consuls: so have Orosius and others that have penned the Marian war. This Cn. Pompeius was father to that Cn. Pompeius the Great: as Appian witnesseth, and Padian upon the Oration against Piso.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, L. Sylla and Q. Pompeius: and the same is written in Osegius, Felicius, Eutropius Orosius, Appian Plutarch, and others. The Sicilian records have Sylla and Rutilius. Sylla after his victory in the civil war, would needs have himself surnamed Felix: and therefore Padian and the avouchers of the capitol monuments, in reporting this consulat, write thus: L. Sylla, who afterwards was called Felix. The same man in his second Consulship, (which appeareth upon record in the capitol) is named the son of Lucius, and nephew of P. Sestius. Moreover, of Q. Pompeius Serratus, Plutarch maketh mention in his Brutus.

Reported there are by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers for Consuls this year, L. Cinna and Cn. Octavius. Appian Plutarch, and others who have recorded the history of this time, name them L. Cornelius Cinna, and Cn. Octavius. Plutarch writeth, that L. Cinna being of the adverse faction to L. Sulla, was by him made consul, upon condition; that he should not cross nor stand against the proceeding of the said L. Sulla: and so soon as he was entred into place of government, he began to trouble and disquiet the present state of the common-weal, yea, and intended an action against Sulla, by the means of P. Valerius a Tribune of the commons. Howbeit Sulla contemning Valerius, made an expedition against Mithridates.

At this time, were Consuls, L. Cinna the seventh time, and L. Cinna the second time, according to the records of Sicily, Cassiodorus, and those that wrote of the civil war. Plutarch saith, that Marius was the first man that was seven times consul of Rome. Moreover, as it is to be read in Appian, and in the Breviaries, L. Cinna and C. Marius, without any lawful assembly for Election, declared themselves Consuls against this year, and the very same day that they entred into their magistracy, Marius commanded Sex. Licinius a Senator, to be thrown down from the rock Tarpeia: who after he had committed many heinous crimes and outrages, ended his daies upon the Ides of January: in whose room was subordained, L. Val. Flaccus, even he (as men think) who before time was colleague to C. Marius in his first Consulship: of whom Plutarch maketh mention in his Oration for his son Flaccus.

L. Cinna III. Cn. Papirius.

Cassiodorus witnesseth that the Consuls succeeding in this year were L. Cinna the third time, and Cn. Papirius. The Sicilian records, have Cinna and Carbo. In the 83 Breviary it is written, that L. Cinna and Cn. Papirius Carbo, for two years together usurped the Consulship. Also in the book entituled, Of famous persons, we read that Cinna made himself Consul a second and third time. Of these Consuls Plutarch speaketh in Sulla, Appian in Mithridaticus, and in the first book of civil wars.

670
L. Cinna IV. Cn. Papirius II.

Next were Consuls, after Cassiodorus and the Epitomis, L. Cinna the fourth time, and and Cn. Papirius the second time. Cicero in his Tusculan questions mentioneth Cinna four times Consul: so doth Suetonius in Caesar. And of Cn. Papirius Carbo twice Consul, the capitol tables do yeeld testimony. As for the Sicilian records, they put down for consul, (not without insinuation of error) Carbo and Scribonius.

C. Norbannus.

Besides the Sicilian tables, Cassiodorus, Obsequens, Appian, Entropius, Florus, and Tacitus in his nineteenth book do witness, that L. Scipio, and C. Norbannus were Consuls. In the capitol fragments it is written, Lu. Cornelius son of Lucius, nephew of L. Scipio Asiaticus.

672

M. Carinus.

Cn. Carbo III.

I Find in Cassiodorus, Appianus, Velleius, and others, the next consuls to have been, C. Marcius and Cn. Carbo the third time. This C. Marcius was the brothers son of C. Marcius seven times consul, according to Appian: but Velleius, Paterculus, Plutarch, Entropius, and others, say, that he was the son of that C. Marcius: and haply indeed he was adopted by C. Marcius. Certainly, in the capitol tables, he is called C. Marcius, son of C. and nephew of C. Marcius. Cicero speaketh of these Consuls, against Rullus: Pliny also in his 17 book, and they who have set down in writing the civil wars of Sylla.

M. Tullius.

Cn. Dolabella.

Next to those, Cassiodorus bringeth in for consuls, M. Tullius and Cn. Dolabella. The Sicilian records, have Decula and Dolabella. Appian also reporteth, that Sylla Dictator, to the end that the state and common-weal might seem to retain some shew yet of her ancient dignity, permitted M. Tullius and Cornelius Dolabella to be created consuls, whilst himself after the manner of K. late aloft in a throne above them. Cicero in his oration against Rullus, and Gellius in his 15 book and 33 chap. maketh mention of M. Tullius and Cn. Cornelius consuls. In a capitol fragment, this M. Tullius, son of M. nephew of A. is surnamed Decula.

674

Q. Metellus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers, set down for Consuls, L. Sylla the second time, and Q. Metellus. Appian saith moreover, that Sylla, Dictator though he was, yet stood content and willing to be declared consul with Q. Metellus Pius, to the end that the common-weal might seem to have some likeness yet of a free state. Of these consuls, Cicero maketh mention in his Orations against Verres, and elsewhere. Gellius likewise in his 15 book and 28 chapter, together with Cassiodorus. This Metellus was surnamed Pius. He it is, who was by lot appointed to manage the wars in Spain and against Sertorius: and son he was to Namidicus.

P. Servilius.

App. Claudius.

THE next consuls, were P. Servilius and App. Claudius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. In the Sicilian tables, it appeareth that their surnames were, Vatia and Pulcher: of whom Appianus writeth thus: The people of Rome in obsequious manner to court Sylla the Dictator, requested of him that he would continue consul still another year: But Sylla would none of that: and took order, that Ser. Isauricus and Claudius Pulcher, should be declared Cons. In a fragment of the capitol he is thus written: Pub. Servilius Vatia, called afterwards Isauricus: which surname he took of the Isaurians, a nation in Cilicia whom he subdued. My authors are, Padianus upon the Orations of Cicero against Verres; Strabo in his 14 book: Marcellinus likewise in his 14 book, with others.

676

M. Lepidus.

Q. Catulus.

M. Lepidus and Q. Catulus, are by Cassiodorus named Consuls for this year. Plutarch reporteth, that when L. Sylla had given up his Dictatorship, and restored again to the people of Rome the free liberty to dispose of consular dignities in their solemn assemblies for elections: M. Lepidus an enemy to Sylla, and an audacious person, was declared Consul before Catulus, and had the preeminence above him, by the earnest endeavour of Cn. Pompeius. Of these Consuls, Pliny maketh mention in his 36 book, wherein he saith, that they governed in the year 676. Likewise, Cicero in his Oration for Cornelius: Florus out of Livy: Valerius a book 3 chap. and Entropius.

677

M. Aemilius.

D. Brutus.

THIS year had for Consuls, by the testimony of Cassiodorus and Obsequens, M. Aemilius and D. Brutus. Macrus, a Tribune of the commons, speaketh of them in Salust, complaining that the commons were by the nobles oppressed. In like sort, Cicero in Brutus, and in his second book of Deiis, as also Valerius in the 7 book and 7 chap. This M. Aemilius was surnamed Lepidus and Livianus: for out of the family of Livies he was adopted by M. Lepidus, and therefore right well he is called, son of M. Aemilius.

678

Cn. Octavius.

C. Curio.

Verrius Flaccus setteth down for Consuls, Cn. Octavius son of M. nephew of C. and C. Scribonius Curio. The same doth Cicero report in Brutus. So do Salust, Obsequens, Laetantius in his first book, and Pliny in his second book and and 35 chapter. Cic. in his Brutus, and Pliny in his 7 book and 41 chapt. make report of three Caii Curions, all Orators to wit, the father, the son, and the sons son or nephew.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls this year, L. Octavius and C. Cotta. Obsequens, C. Aurelius and L. Octavius. Pliny in his second book and 35 chapt. Cicero likewise in his third and fifth Orations against Verres, maketh mention of L. Octavius, and C. Aurelius consuls. Upon the broken marbles of the capitol, they stand to be seen, L. Octavius son of Cn. nephew of Cn. and C. Aurelius. This year the Sicilian registers over-skip. Padianus writeth, that there were at this time three Cotta's brethren, and all of consular degree, namely, Caius, Marcus and Lucius.

For this years consuls, Cassiodorus registreth L. Lucullus, and M. Cotta. The Sicilian records, Lucullus and Cotta, Entropius, Appianus in Mithridatica, and Plutarch in Lucullus, nameth them, L. Licinius Lucullus, and M. Aurelius Cotta. Mention there is made of them by Cicero against Verres; and by Florus in the 93 and 94 Epitomes. This L. Lucullus had for his grand-father that Lucullus, who was consul with A. Albinus, as Cicero and Plutarch do testify.

M. Lucullus. C. Cassius.

This year (by the testimony of Cassiodorus.) had for consuls, M. Lucullus, and C. Cassius: but the Sicilian records, nominate Marcellus and Cassius: whom Cicero in an oration against Verres, nameth M. Terentius and C. Cassius: saying that the laws Terentia and Cassia, were by them promulged. For, so far forth as we may conjecture by the capitol fragments, M. Licinius Lucullus, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and therefore called M. Terentius Varro Lucullus. Cicero in Lucullus, and Plutarch, call L. Lucullus and M. Lucullus brethren, whom Entropius nameth cousin Germans by two sisters. That the surname of Cassius was Varus, appeareth both by a conduit pipe or waterspout of lead found in Rome, and also for that Appian in his fourth book, writeth that C. Cassius Varus, a man who had been Consul, was condemned and outlawed by the Triumvirs.

L. Gellius. Cn. Lentulus.

The consuls next following, by the report of Cassiodorus, were L. Gellius and Cn. Lentulus. In like sort Cicero maketh mention of them in his oration for Balbus, and elsewhere. Plutarch also in Crassus, with Entropius and Orosius. Cuspinian's book sheweth Poplicola and Lentulus. Now the surname of L. Gellius was Poplicola, as witnesseth Onuphrius.

Cn. Aufidius. P. Lentulus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for consuls this year, Cn. Aufidius, and P. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers have Lentulus and Orestes. Entropius, C. Lentulus and Cn. Aufidius Orestes. This Cn. Aufidius Orestes, when he went beside a Tribuneship of the commons, was chosen consul, as Cicero writeth in his oration for Planinius. This is that P. Lentulus surnamed Sura, who afterwards, being a man of consular calling, and who had been twice Pretor, was hanged and strangled to death when Cicero was consul, for that he had conspired with Catilin: whose grand-father was P. Lentulus President of the Senas, as Cicero saith, pleading for his house, and inveighing against Catilin: as also Padianus.

M. Crassus. Cn. Pompeius.

Next to them were Goss. M. Crassus and Cn. Pompeius, according to Cassiodorus, Plutarch, Appian, and the Sicilian records. Their surnames for certain, were Dives and Magnus. All the old writers speak much of this their first Consulship. Plutarch reporteth that L. Crassus attained to the Consular dignity, by the means of Pompeius the consul. Besides, Cicero, Salust, Padian writing upon the oration for Cornelius, and all other authors speak of these consuls.

Q. Metellus. Q. Hortensius.

Then followed consuls, Q. Metellus and Q. Hortensius, as Cassiodorus and the Sicilian catalogue do testify. Padianus matcheth Q. Metellus Creticus with Q. Hortensius that great Orator! Likewise, Josephus in his fourteenth book of Jewish antiquities. Cicero in Brutus calleth this Q. Hortensius, the son of Lucius. Q. Metellus afterwards upon the conquest made of Crete surnamed Creticus, was the son of L. Dalmaticus, as may be gathered out of Padianus upon the Oration of Tully [called Divinatio] against Verres.

Padianus writing upon Tully's Oration against Piso; Dio likewise and Cassiodorus, join together in the consulship this year, L. Cecilius Metellus, and Q. Marcius. The Greek records, Marcius Rex, and Metellus. This Metellus, Dio writeth to have died in the very beginning of his magistracy: that he also who was substituted in his room, left this life before he entered into the government: and thereupon it was not thought good to subelett any more: and by that means Q. Marcius bare that dignity alone: and him Salust enticureth with the surname of Rex. This L. Metellus was brother to Q. Creticus, as Padian witnesseth.

687

C. Piso. M. Glabrio.

Here succeeded Consuls, C. Piso and M. Glabrio, witness Cassiodore and the Sicilian records. And in Dio they follow immediately by the name of Manius Acilius and C. Piso. Cicero in his twelfth book of Epistles to Atticus, speaketh of C. Piso and M. Acilius Glabrio, men of Consular place and calling. Padian in his commentaries upon the oration for Cornelius maketh mention of C. Piso and the law Calpurnia by him made, as touching inordinate and indirect suite after dignities of state. Moreover, of them Valerius in his fourth book writeth.

M. Lepidus. L. Volcatius.

Cassiodore putteth down for Consuls, Manius Lepidus, and with him L. Torquatus, but untruly. The Greek records have Volcatius Tullus. Dio Lucius Tullus, and Emilius Lepidus. Salust in Catiline, L. Tullus and M. Lepidus. Padian upon the oration for Cornelius, M. Lepidus and L. Volcatius. Cicero in his oration for Sulla hath L. Volcatius Tullus: so as it appeareth it should be, M. Emilius Lepidus, and L. Volcatius Tullus.

The Consuls elect, were L. Antonius Patrus (as it appeareth upon a monument of a triumph in the capitol, and not Antonius, as commonly it is read) and P. Cornelius Sulla: who being condemned for ambitious seeking after that office, and having therefore suffered condign punishment, their accusers stept into their place of government, namely, L. Aurelius son of Marcus, surnamed Coita; and L. Manlius son of Lucius, surnamed also Torquatus: as testify Salust, Dio, Padian upon the oration for Cornelius, and that which he made in his white robe: and lastly, Tranquillus in Caesar.

The year next ensuing had for Consuls, by the testimony of Cassiodore, Padianus, and the Sicilian records, L. Caesar and C. Figulus, whom Dio calleth Lucius Caesar, and Lucius Martius son of Caius, surnamed Figulus. Cicero in his oration for Sulla, nameth them L. Julius and C. Figulus: so doth Salust in Catilina. This L. Julius Caesar is his son who was Consul in the Marian war.

691

M. Cicero. C. Antonius.

The Consuls this year, were M. Tullius son of M. surnamed Cicero, and C. Antonius son of M. as testify Dio in his seven and thirtieth book, Cassiodore, Salust in his Catilinary oration, Velleius in his second book, Joseph in his Jewish antiquities 14 book 8 chapter. Pliny in his eight book and three and fiftieth chapter, Tranquillus in the life of Augustus, Appian, Eutropius, Padian, and others.

Here followed consuls next, D. Silanus, and L. Murana, as Cassiodorus, Salust, and the Sicilian records do witness. Dio calleth them D. Junius son of M. surnamed Silanus: and L. Liscinius son of L. surnamed Murana. Eutropius nameth them D. Junius Silanus, and L. Liscinius, son of that L. Murana who in quality of Pro-pretor triumphed over Mithridates (as Cicero saith) pleading for Murana himself, being accused and in trouble for unlawful seeking to be Cos. In this assembly for election of Cos. L. Sergius Catilina suffered the second repulse: for anger whereof, in a melancholy he brake out into a conspiracy, and practised against the state: and likewise Servius Sulpicius Rufus the lawyer, who afterwards accused Murana for the crime aforesaid.

M. Pupius. M. Valerius.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year, M. Pupius and M. Valerius. The Sicilian registers, Piso and Messala. Dio, M. Pupius, son of M. surnamed Piso: and M. Valerius son of M. surnamed Messala Niger. Of this Messala Niger, there is also mention made by Padian upon the oration for Scawrus. Also of M. Messala and M. Piso, in Plinies seventh book, and six and twentieth chapter, seven and thirtieth book, cap. second, and the eight book, chap. six and twenty. And in Caesars first book of the Gauls war. Of M. Piso Padian likewise speaketh writing upon the oration against Piso.

Q. Metellus. Q. Afranius.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers nominate for this years Consuls, Q. Metellus and L. Africannus. The like doth Obsequens and Cicero in his first book of Epistles to Atticus. Dio nameth them L. Afranius son of L. and Q. Caecilius, son of Q. surnamed Metellus Celer. Both of them were advanced to the Consulate (as Dio witnesseth) by the means of Pompeius, for they had been both twain his Lieutenants serving under him in Affe.

C. Caesar. M. Bibulus.

Cassiodorus, Suetonius, together with the Sicilian tables and the Breviaries, do march together for consuls this year, C. Caesar and M. Bibulus. Dio, C. Julius son of C. Caesar, and M. Calpurnius. Plutarch and Appian, C. Julius Caesar, and C. Bibulus. Albeit Appian, as also Eutropius and Orosius give Bibulus the forename of Lucius. Of Caesar and Bibulus, Cicero speaketh in his first book of Epistles, writing to Lentulus.

L. Piso. A. Gabinus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records shew for Consuls this year, L. Piso and A. Gabinus. Dio, L. Calpurnius son of L. Piso: and A. Gabinus son of Aulus. Caesar, Cicero, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus, L. Piso, and A. Gabinus. Caesar writeth of them in his first book of the Gauls war, and Plutarch in the life of Cato the younger. Crevier also in his oration against Piso and for Sex-tius. This Piso the Consul Cicero and Padian surnamed Cesonius, for so his grand-father before him was called, as appeareth in the capitol records for the year 606.

P. Lentulus. Q. Metellus.

The Consuls following for this year, were by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records, P. Lentulus and Q. Metellus. By Dio, Pub. Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Spinther: and Q. Caecilius son of Qu. Metellus Nepos. Of them speaketh Valerius in his ninth book, Lentulus (qd. he) and Metellus companions in the consulship were beheld and seen both upon the stage like players: but the one of them took the surname of Spinther: * one of the second sort of actors: the other, but that he had gotten the name of * Nepos already for his lewd behaviours, should have been called Pamphilus, after the name of * one of a third sort, whom for all the world he resembled. Of the same men, Cicero in his first book of Epistles, and in very many of his orations. Plutarch also in his seventh book and second chapter, Plutarch in the life of Cicero, and all other writers make much mention.

* Secundarium.

* A ruffian.

* Tertianum.

Cn. Lentulus. L. Philippus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Cn. Lentulus and L. Philippus. The Sicilian records, Marcellus and Philippus. Dio, Cn. Cornelianus son of Publius, Lentulus Marcellus: and L. Marius son of Lucius Philippus. Of Lentulus and M. Marcellus Consuls, Cicero speaketh in his Epistles to Lentulus, Plutarch also in the life of Cato, maketh mention of Marius Philippus now Consul. This Cn. Lentulus was the son of that P. Lentulus, as Cicero saith in his Brutus. And surnamed he was Marcellus, and not Claudius, that it might be known, of what family of the Claudii he was descended.

Cn. Pompeius. M. Crassus.

When as by the obstinate persistance of C. Cato Tribun of the commons, (who ever interposed his negative) there could be no ordinary assembly holden for the creation of magistrates, the whole degree of the Senators changed their weed in token of grief: so as upon an Interregency between, Cn. Pompeius was choien Consul, and with him M. Crassus the second time, as Plutarch, Dio, and Appian do witnels. Lucius Domitius Aenobarbus, whom Cato and all good men accompanied and presented, was in the common place by violence thoroughly beaten, and Cato himself wounded. These Cons. Dio calleth Cn. Pompeius, son of Cn. Magnus the second time: and M. Licinius son of Publius Crassus, the second time. Of them Padian, Eutropius, the Sicilian registers and others make mention.

Ap. Claudius. L. Domitius.

Dio in his nine and thirtieth book, for the year after the cities foundation 700. following the computation of Varro, avoucheth Consuls, Appius Claudius, son of Appius Pulcher: and L. Domitius son of Cneus, Aenobarbus. Cassiodorus and Obsequens, name them, Ap. Claudius and L. Domitius, whom the Sicilian records call Pulcher and Aenobarbus: and Padian upon the Oration for Scantius, L. Domitius Aenobarbus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher. Of this L. Domitius, son of Cneus Aenobarbus, Calins speaketh in the eight book of Ciceros Epistles.

Cn. Domitius. M. Messala.

Against this year there stood in election and laboured with much earnestness and ambitious desire to be Consuls, Catus Maximus, Cn. Domitius, M. Messala and M. Scantius, as Cicero writeth to his brother Quintus. But at the last, even in the seventh month of this year there were created by means of an Interregency, M. Messala and Cn. Domitius. Neither had they been chosen then: but that Q. Pompeius Rufus a Tribun of the commons, who still opposed himself to hinder and debar all election, was by order from the Senate committed: and the Senate made countenance to do the like by the rest, as many as went about to cross the said election. Thus much Dio. But Appian saith, that the common-weal continued for eight months space in Anarchy without any sovereign magistrats of state. Plutarch writeth, that in this so great extremity of danger, Lucilius a Tribun of the commons, preferred a bill for the creating of Cneus Pompeius Dictator, who should redress all enormities and set upright the state again: but Cato gain-said it, and so nothing was effected. Dio saith moreover, that the Tribuns of the commons moved for the chusing not of a Dictator only, but also of military Tribuns in consuls authority: but through the earnest labour of Pompeius, Consuls were created, Messala and Calvinus, which surnames stand to be seen upon the Sicilian records. Also in the capitol monuments, written it is thus. Cn. Domitius Calvinus son of M. nephew of Marcus, anno 708 and 717.

701

705. Q. Pompeius, Q. Marcellus, C. Claudius

When by reason of the contentions among so mighty competitors, the Consuls could not be created by the Calends of January: there passed an Act of the Senate, according to the mind and advice of Sulpicius, by virtue whereof Caesar Pompeius was by the Interest of Serpius Sulpicius created Consul the third time, upon the five and twentieth of February, without a Collegue first, and presently entered upon the government. But afterwards to avoid the envy that might arise thereupon, he took unto him as companion in the Consulship for the five last months of the year behind, Q. Caelius Pius Marcellus Scipio, his wives father. Thus writeth Plinius upon the Oration of Cicero in defence of M. P. Plurarch likewise, Sulpicius and Pio. This M. P. Plurarch was also called P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, son of Nasica Scipio, who being adopted by Q. Marcellus Pius, is called by Caelius in the familiar Epistles of Cicero; Q. Caelius son of Q. Marcellus Pius, nephew of Q. Marcellus Pius Scipio.

Against this year were Consuls created M. Marcellus, and Serpius Sulpicius, as Cassiodorus, Plinius, and Appian witness. The Sicilian records call them Rufus and Marcellus; Dion methem Serpius Sulpicius son of Q. sumamed Rufus, and M. Claudius son of M. sumamed also Marcellus. Of these Consuls Suetonius also maketh mention in Caesar: likewise Cicero in his Epistles, and the Epitome 113. This Marcellus was the cousin german of this Marcellus who the year next following was Consul: and brother german to him who two years after bare the Consulship, as may be collected out of Horatius Flaccus, Dion, and Suetonius.

704. L. Paulus, C. Marcellus

Here succeeded Consuls, L. Paulus and C. Marcellus, witness Cassiodorus, Dion Suetonius, Hirtius in his 8 book, together with the Sicilian records. The one of these is by Dion named Ep. Amyntius son of M. Amyntus, surnamed Paulus; the other by Cicero in his Epistles, C. Claudius son of C. Claudius Marcellus. Dion writeth that this man by some was reported to be a brother of Marcellus, others a nephew, the brother of Marcellus, but Suetonius saith plainly, he was the brothers son, and was brother to L. Paulus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus, as also Appian, Plurarch, Hirtius, Florus, and Cicero in his Epistles do testify. Dion calleth these Consuls

L. Cornelius, son of Publius Lentulus, and C. Claudius son of Marcus Marcellus. In the broken marbles of the Capitol it is to be seen thus, C. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of Marcus Marcellus. This is that Lucius Lentulus Cras, who as Cicero testifieth in the former election took a repulse, and by Cicero is called in the Oration against Plinius, Flamen Marcellus.

706. C. Caesar, P. Servilius

When C. Caesar the Dictator held the solemn assembly for the election in the latter end of the former year, Consuls there were created C. Julius, son of C. Caesar, and Pub. Servilius, son of Publius Isauricus. For now was the year come, when as Caesar by the laws might be chosen Consul for so in the third book of his own Commentaries he saith himself, and so Dion in his one and fortieth book, Plurarch, Tranquillus, Appianus, and Cassiodorus do testify of him. But he meaneth that law which expressly forbade and debatted, that no man might be within ten years space chosen Consul twice. As for Publius Servilius he was the son of that Publius Servilius that first took the surname Isauricus, who this year bare his Consulship at Rome, while Caesar waited in Macedonia.

707. Q. Fabius Caelenus, P. P. P. P. P.

Dio saith, That the people of Rome having intelligence that Pompeius was murdered, endeavoured earnestly that there might pass as honourable decrees for Caesar the Conqueror as possible might be. And therefore they ordained, that he might be Consul five years together, and Dictator not for six months as beforetime, but a whole year: and ended with the Tribunes authority for ever. Now Caesar, albeit he was without Italy, immediately entered upon his Dictatorship, having sub-ordained under him for his General of the horse, M. Antonius, a man who yet had not been Praetor. This appeareth by the Capitol records, Dion Plurarch, and Cicero in his second Philippica. But under what pretence and colour Caesar took upon him this Dictatorship and the rest following, Marcus Antonius sheweth in his Oration of Caesar praise in Dion wherein he saith, that Caesar was created Dictator to make head against the enemies; and therefore the troubles and dissensions of war was the cause of this creation. But certain it is that Caesar became Dictator for another cause, namely, that by the means of that sovereign power, he might draw unto himself alone the whole managing and government of the State, which beforetime had been administered by many persons. But Dion addeth moreover and saith, that in the beginning of this year there were neither Praetors nor Consuls elected. For Marcus Antonius General of the horse, arrayed in his purple robes, with a Dictator, making way before him, resembled a certain

certain shew of the ancient liberty. But with in a while after he departed forth of the City, and that which never was before done by any Master of the horse, he left Ln. Caesar an aged man, Provost and governor of Rome. Howbeit, in the end of the year, after the recovery and conquest of Egypt, when King Ptolemeus was slain, and Pharnaces K. of Pontus vanquished: Consuls were created, Q. Fufius, son of Quintus, Calenus; and Pub. Vatinius, son of Publius. And these the Capitoll tables do shew, and Cassiodorus also. Of Publius Vatinius Consul, Macrobius in his second book maketh mention.

C. Caesar. M. Lepidus.

V Errius in his capitoll tables setteth forth Consuls of this year, only without ever a Dictator. The stone record of Colatius, whereof Onuphrius speaketh here, nameth C. Julius Caesar the third time, and M. Emilius Lepidus. But Dio in his three and fortieth book, The next year following (quoth he) he bare the Dictatorship and the Consul both, the third time, and took unto him for his Colleague in both Magistracies, M. Emilius Lepidus. Of the same mind seemeth Tranquillus to be in Caesar, chap. seventy six. Likewise Hirtius in the fift book. But Onuphrius supposeth that both Tranquillus and Dio, yea, and Hirtius also was in an error. For with the capitoll records, Plutarch and Eutropius agree: who write that Caesar this year was Consul the third time with M. Lepidus and Dictator the second time.

C. Caesar. Q. Maximus.

They who cut the capitoll marbles, do shew unto us that Caesar this year was third time Dictator with M. Lepidus General of the horse. From whom Dio differeth: who doth report that this year Caesar was Dictator the 4 time, and Lepidus second time Master of the horsemen: also that Lepidus fellow-Consul with Caesar, declareth himself against all law, Generall of the horse. Thus much of the Dictator. But as touching the Consuls this year, there is to be seen written in the Index or table of Dio, that the same year Caesar bare his fourth Dictatorship, and likewise his fourth Consul without Colleague. In that history also it appeareth, that Caesar presently entred upon his fourth Consulat, but bare it not throughout the whole year: and that so soon as he was returned to Rome out of Spain, he resigned and substituted in his place for the rest of the year, Q. Fabius Maximus, and Cn. Trebonius. With Dio, the evidences agree that are written in the capitoll fragments: wherein it appeareth that Caesar was the fourth time Consul, and that without a Colleague: as Sigonius maketh interpretation. For Cyprianus Kalender, together with the Sicilian registers, do shew that Caesar was Consul now alone the fourth time. In like manner, Appian and Plutarch make mention of Caesar, who being Consul elect from the fourth time led an army into Spain. As for Q. Fabius, Suetonius calleth him a three months Consul. Dio faith moreover, that Caesar upon the death of Q. Fabius the Consul, declared the very last day of the year, C. Caninius to be the Consul for those few hours that were behind. Whereof Cicero in his seventh book of Epistles, writing to Centurius, Macrobius in his second book of Saturnalia, Macius in his eighteenth book, Pliny in his seventh, and Sextus in his first do make mention.

Dio setteth down for this year Caesar Dictator the fift time, together with M. Emilius Lepidus Master of the horsemen. But the capitoll tables avouch him Dictator now the fourth time. Dio and Appian write that he created himself Consul together with M. Antonius. Likewise Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers give record that Caesar was this year Consul the fift time, together with M. Antonius. And Macrobius in his first book speaketh of them. Moreover, written it is in the capitoll and Colatian tables, that C. Caesar was Consul the fift time, with M. Antonius son of M, and that in the room of Caesar there was chosen P. Cornelius Dolabella, whom Caesar himself (if he had lived) meant to have substituted in his own room. Plutarch writeth that Caesar Consul now the fift time took unto him for his companion in government M. Antonius. And when as he would have substituted Dolabella in his own stead, Antony gainstaid it in an oration: and afterwards, when Caesar a second time would have had Dolabella to be declared Consul, and still Antony crossed, and withstood it, Caesar gave over his enterprise. But after Caesar was murdered, Antony (as Dio writeth) fearing some insurrection and commotion if he should have rejected Dolabella, took him into the fellowship of government. Appian faith, that immediately after Caesar was killed, Dolabella entred into the Magistracy. So faith Velleius also. And this verily was the year, in which the conspiracy was contrived against Caesar, whereof the captains were M. and Decimus both Brutus, C. Trebonius, C. Cassius: and upon the fifteenth day of March, when he sat in Council together with the Senat in the court of Pompey, he was stabbed, and received in his body three and twenty wounds: which done, the murderers who had wrought the feat seized the capitoll. And C. Octavius his nephew or sisters son, whom Caesar had made in his will his half-her, and adopted to bear his own name, came out of Epirus, whither Caesar had sent him before, minding to make war upon the Parthians, and after all lucky and happy proceedings, took upon him the name of Caesar, according to his last will and testament.

C. Pansa. A. Hirtius.

Dio, Cassiodorus, and the rest, nominate Consuls for this year, C. Vibius Pansa Capronianus, and A. Hirtius, son of Anlus. Cuspinianus book sheweth Cresonianus and Hirtius. Whereby it may be understood, that Cresonianus was the surname of Pansa, but peradventure written for Capronianus. In the Colotian table they are named C. Vibius, son of Caius, and A. Hirtius son of Hirtius. This Hirtius was one of their sons who were out-lawed by Sulla, and whom Caesar (as Dio reporteth) advanced to honourable dignities. Both these, and the Consuls of the year following, were by Caesar elected and destined thereto, before he was slain. Dio, Appian, and others report, that of these two Consuls, Hirtius in the time of the civil war, in a battell before Modena against Antonius was slain; and Pansa some daies after, upon a hurt received in the same fight, died at Bononia. In the room of Pansa, C. Octavius was sub-elected Consul, the nineteenth of August in the same year, and he instead of Hirtius, took unto him for his Colleague Q. Pedius.

M. Lepidus. L. Plancus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records put down for Consuls, M. Lepidus and L. Plancus. Dio, M. Amylius Lepidus the second time, and Lu. Munatius, son of Lucius, surnamed Plancus. Of these Consuls Suetonius speaketh in Tiberius, saying, That Tiberius was born after the battell of Philippi, when Mar. Amylius Lepidus was the second time Consul with Munatius Plancus. Now had there been before appointed Consuls against this year by Caesar, D. Brutus and Lu. Plancus. But by reason that Brutus the year before was by the law Pedia condemned and after killed, and so the three Triumvirs usurped the rule of the common-weal; agreed it was, that M. Lepidus one of the Triumvirs who beforetime also had been Consul with Caesar in his third Consulship, should together with Plancus, (who also taking part and siding with Antony, had revolted from the Common-weal) administer the Consular. Moreover, this Brutus was by Plutarch, Appian, Dio, and Zonaras, called also Albinus; I suppose, for that out of the race of the Bruti he was adopted and incorporated into the house of the Albini. In this year, during the civil war, Brutus and Cassius were slain in battell before Philippi, as Dio, Plutarch, Appian, and others write,

713

P. Servilius II. L. Antonius.

The Colotian tables, Dio, and Cassiodorus match Consuls together for this year, L. Antonius son of Marcus, surnamed Pietas, and P. Servilius, son of Publius, Isauricus, the second time. Of these Consuls, Suetonius writeth in Tiberius. This P. Servilius was first Consul with Caesar in his second Consulship; whose father Isauricus died a little before, as Dio and Eusebius report. As for L. Antonius, named he is by Dio Pietas, for that being Consul, he together with Fulvia the wife of his brother Marcus, managed the affairs of state with that mind, as if his whole care had been for his brother the Triumvir, in regard of which brotherly and affectionate kindness, he challenged the surname of Pietas.

Cn. Domitius. C. Asinius.

A Colotian table, Dio, and Cassiodorus joyn in the Consulship of this year, Cneus Domitius son of Marcus, Calvinus, the second time; and C. Asinius, son of Cneus, Pollio. Of these, Josephus speaketh in his fourteenth book of the Jews antiquities and three and twenty chapter. Toward the end of this year, Dio writeth, that these Consuls gave up their place, and that other Consuls were substitute for those few daies that were to come; and one of them was L. Cornelius Balbus Gaditavus. And therefore in the Colotian table these subordinated Consuls stand under these names, L. Cornelius, son of Lucius, and P. Canidius, son of Lucius. Of Pub. Cornel. Balbus Consul, Pliny writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter, and Velleius in his second book.

Cassiodorus inferred for the next Consuls, Lucius Censorinus and Caius Calvisius. The Sicilian records have Censorinus and Sabinus, Dio, L. Marius and C. Sabinus, C. Calvisius son of Caius, is named by Dio in the catalogue or table, Sabinus, although it be read there commonly, but amiss, Asinius.

716

Ap. Claudius. C. Norbanus.

Consuls that follow, were App. Claudius and C. Norbanus, as Cassiodorus saith. But as the Sicilian registers, purport, Censorinus and Sabinus: as Dio writeth, App. Claudius son of Caius, Pulcher; and C. Norbanus, son of Caius, Flaccus. As touching Tadius Afer the Consul elect, and substitute in the room of another, who before he entered into government, being terrified with the minatory threats of C. Caesar, threw himself down headlong, and so brake his neck, see Tranquillus in Augustus.

717

M. Agrippa. L. Caninius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, M. Agrippa and Lu. Caninius. The Sicilian registers Agrippa and Gallus, Dio, M. Vipsanius, son of Lucius, Agrippa; and L. Caninius son of Lucius, Gallus. Josephus in his fifteenth book of Antiquities, avoucheth Consuls, Mar. Agrippa and C. Canidius Gallus. Nepos also in the life of Articus, calleth Vipsanius, Agrippa. In the capitol marbles marbles and in other old monuments of Rome his gentile name is passed over, and namely, in the forefront of the Temple, called Pantheon, wherein is engraven M. Agrippa son of Lucius, Consul the third time. Tacitus also in his first book mentioneth this Agrippa.

Y y y a

718

L. Gellius. M. Cocceius.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls this year, L. Gellius and M. Cocceius. The Sicilian records shew Publicola and Nerva: Dio hath L. Gellius son of Lucius Poplicola, and M. Cocceius Nerva. Out of the capitoll fragments it appeareth, that L. Gellius was the son of Lucius, and nephew of Lucius. By the report of Dio, this L. Gellius was brother to M. Valerius Messala. For it is the same man who was pardoned before by M. Brutus: whereby it may be understood, that Poplicola was his surname by way of adoption: for they were not the Gellii but the Valerii, that carried the surname of Publicola. The same fragments do shew, that the said Gellius left his place, and that another was put in his room. And haply it was L. Munatius, son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius Plancus: whom Pliny in his thirteenth book and third chapter, saith to have been twice Consul: but in what year he was the second time, a man cannot find, unless it were in this.

719

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records testifie, that this years Consuls were Sext. Pompeius and L. Cornificius. Dio L. Cornificius son of Lucius; and Sextus Pompeius son of Sextus. This year Sext. Pompeius, son of Cneus was slain.

M. Antonius. L. Scribonius Libo.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, L. Scribonius and L. Atratinus. The Sicilian catalogue Antonius and Libo. Dio, M. Antonius son of Marcus the second time, and L. Scribonius, son of Lucius Libo. The same Dio saith moreover, that M. Antonius the Triumvir, presently upon the very Calends of January gave over the Magistracy, and substituted in his own stead Lu. Sempronius Atratinus: and therefore many there be that affirm how it was not Antonius but Atratinus that was Consul this year with Libo. That Consuls also were sub-elected to bear out one part of the year, it is to be found in some authors that have set forth the Municipal Annals. And verily Dio maketh mention of Paulus Emilius Consul, for one part of the year, and that he built a stately porch or gallery at his own charges, and dedicated it in his Consulship.

721

C. Caesar. L. Volcatius.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth unto us for Consuls, C. Caesar and L. Volcatius. Dio, Caesar the second time, and L. Volcatius son of Lucius Tullus. They who composed and digested the Sicilian registers, very unfully set down Caesar and Cicero for this years Consuls. Of this Consulship of Caesar, Suetonius and Dio speak, saying, that he held it very few hours, as Antonius also beforetime. In stead of Caesar was L. Antonius subrogated, and many other for one part or other of the year, who in the book entitled, Old inscriptions, are reckoned in this manner:

Emperor Caesar II. L. Volcatius.

Kal. Januarii. L. Antonius.

Kal. Maii. L. Flavius.

Kal. Iulii. M. Asinius.

C. Fonteius.

Kal. Sept. L. Vinutius.

Kal. Octob. L. Antonius.

Of L. Flavius made Consul by M. Antonius, and deposed, Dio likewise maketh mention.

Cn. Domitius. C. Sosius.

Cassiodorus nominateth for Consuls this year, Cn. Domitius and C. Sosius. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and Sosius. Dio, Cneus Domitius, son of Cneus, nephew of Cneus Enobarbus; and C. Sosius son of C. nephew of Caius Nepos writeth, that Atticus died, when Cn. Domitius and C. Sosius were Consuls.

723

C. Caesar II. M. Messala.

Cassiodorus avoucheth Consuls this year, C. Caesar the second time, and M. Messala. The Sicilian registers, Octavius and Corvinus. Dio, Caesar the third time, and M. Valerius, son of Marcus, surnamed Messala Corvinus, and that right truly. For Cassiodorus maketh no reckoning of that Consulship of Caesar, which he bare with Pedius, because he was subordained in the place with another. But Dio and Appian do witness, that Caesar and Antony were marched together this year, both of them in their second Consulship; at what time as upon peace made with Sextus Pompeius, they were appointed Consuls beforehand for eight years next ensuing: howbeit, in the first year the people turned Antony out of his Consulship, and proclaimed war against him and Cleopatra, and so in his place was Mar. Messala declared Consul. As touching the Consuls this year subordained, thus we find written in the ancient inscriptions, Emperour Caesar III. M. Valerius.

Kal. Maii. M. Titius.

Kal. Octobris. Cn. Pompeius.

724

C. Caesar III. M. Crassus.

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls, C. Caesar the third time, and M. Crassus. The Sicilian records Octavius and Crassus. Dio, Caesar the fourth time, and M. Licinius, son of Marcus Crassus. He added moreover, and saith, Caesar in the midst of that water crossed the seas out of of Macedonia into Italy, wherein he was the fourth time Consul with M. Crassus. Orosius likewise noteth, that Caesar called Emperor, was Consul the fourth time with M. Livius Crassus. Of other Consuls substituted after M. Licinius, this we find in the old inscriptions.

Emperor Caesar IV. M. Licinius.

Kal. Jul. C. Antistius.

Ibid. Septembr. M. Tullius.

Kal. Novembr. L. Sanius.

Of M. Tullius Consul with Augustus, Dio maketh mention in his story of this years acts. Pliny also in his 22 book and 6 chap. and Plutarch in Cicero. By Velleius and Tacitus it appeareth that Antistius had for addition the surname of Vetus, and Sanius of Savinus.

C. Caesar III. Sext. Apuleius.

IN Cassiodorus the Consuls be C. Caesar the fourth time, and Sext. Apuleius. In Di. Caesar the fifth time, and Sext. Apuleius son of Sext. In the Sicilian records, Octavianus and Apuleius: in the Antique inscriptions, Emperor Caesar the fifth time, and Sext. Apuleius. Dio saith, this was the year 725 from the foundation of the City. Of Caesar five times Consul, there is to be seen an old Epigram or inscription in this manner.

*Senatus Populusq; Romanus, Imp. Caf. Divi Julii Fil. Caf. Quinc.
Caf. Desig. Sext. Imp. Sept.
Resp. conferata.*

That is,

The Senat and people of Rome. By Emperor Caesar, son of Julius of famous memory, Consul five times, elect Consul the sixth time, and Emperor the seventh, the Commonwealth saved.

C. Caesar V. M. Agrippa II.

Cassiodorus declareth for Consuls this year, Caesar the fifth time, and M. Agrippa the second time. Orosius and the Sicilian records, Caesar the sixth time, and Agrippa the second time. Dio, Caesar the sixth time, and M. Vipsanius Agrippa the third time: but it is to be read the second time, as Sigonius advertiseth, so as the next year it should be written the third time. And this plainly appeareth by the superscription of that Temple (which he erected and named Pantheon) in this form, [M. Agrippa son of L. third time Consul built it.] For Dio saith, that this Temple was finished two years after that he was Consul with Caesar the seventh time Consul, in which year himself bare his third Consulship, and not the fourth. For otherwise in the front of the said Temple, he would have written, [Consul the fourth time.]

727
C. Caesar VI. M. Agrippa III.

Cassiodorus saith, that the next Consuls were Caesar the sixth time, and M. Agrippa the third time. But Dio, Caesar the seventh time, and Agrippa the fourth time. But what is to be thought of them both, is evident by that which hath been said before. In the Sicilian registers verily it is written, Octavianus the seventh time, and Agrippa the third time.

C. Augustus Caesar VII. T. Statilius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Caesar Augustus the seventh time, and T. Statilius. The Sicilian monuments, Octavianus the eighth time, and Taurus. Dio, Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and Statilius Taurus the second time. For he had been Consul first, for a part of the year, anno 727, and now is the second time: of whom Suetonius writeth thus in Nero; Nero took to wife Statilia Messalina, daughter (in the fourth descent) of Taurus, one who had been twice Consul, and also triumphant: he writeth also, that Augustus entred upon his eight and ninth Consul at Tarracon.

C. Caesar Augustus VIII. M. Silanus.

Cassiodorus sheweth for Consuls next, Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and M. Silanus. Dio and the Sicilian records, Augustus the ninth time, and M. Silanus. A fragment of the capitol, Emperor Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and M. Junius Silanus. This year Augustus Caesar was Emperor the eighth time, and shut up the Temple of Janus the fourth time now that ever it was shut: which he had set open before in regard of certain wars, as Dio reporteth.

C. Caesar Augustus IX. C. Norbannus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for this years Consuls, Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and C. Norbannus. The Sicilian registers, Augustus the tenth time, and Flaccus. Dio, and a fragment of the capitol marble, Augustus the tenth time, and C. Norbannus Flaccus. This Norbannus seemeth to be the son of C. Norbannus the Consul, anno 716, for he had not the numerall note testifying a second Consulship.

731

C. Caesar Augustus X. Cn. Piso.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Caesar Augustus the tenth time, and Cn. Piso. The Sicilian records, Augustus the eleventh time, and Piso. And Dio, Augustus the eleventh time, with Cn. Calpurnius, son of Cn. Piso. By a fragment of the capitol stone it appeareth that Augustus entered the Consulship the eleventh time, together with Annius Terentius Varro Murena: also that Murena died in his Magistracy, in whose stead was elected Cn. Calpurnius Piso: and Augustus went out of his government. Of which matter Dio thus writeth: Augustus went to the Alban hill, and there resigned up the Consulship. For whereas both he himself and many others, ever since the time that the C.W. was set in frame and established, had born the yearly Magistrats, he thought that from thence forwards he was to forbear the same, to the end, that the honourable dignity of Consuls should be open to as many as might be. And this did he with but the City, because he would not be hindred and letted in the action; and therewith substituted in his place Lucius Sestius, a man that of all others most affected and loved Brutus: who also wrote of his praises and commendable parts.

M. Marcellus. L. Aruntius.

THis year had for Consuls, as saith Cassiodorus, M. Marcellus and L. Aruntius: as Dio, M. Claudius son of Marcus Marcellus, and A. Sernius son of Lucius. In the Capitoll stone these Consuls are thus set down, L. Aruntius son of L. nephew of L. and M. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of M. Whereby it is given to understand, that in the Sicilian records the Consuls are not well put down to be Octavianus the twelfth time, and Aruntius. In this year, the conspiracy of Fannius Capi and Vatro Murana against Augustus was discovered: and the Temple of thundering Jupiter was dedicated, witness Dio.

M. Lollius. Q. Lepidus.

THe Colotian stone and Cassiodorus shew for this year Consuls, Q. Emilius Lepidus and M. Lollius. Dio writeth, when Augustus was in Sicily, and the people of Rome at the assembly for Consuls election, there arose a sedition and commotion. For M. Lollius only entered upon the government, by reason that the other place was reserved and kept for Augustus: but when he made refusal, Q. Lepidus was created. Of these Consuls Horace in his first book of Epistles writeth thus:

Me quater andenas sciat implevisse. Decembres; Callegam Lepidum quo dixit Evallius anno.

Know he, that 40 winters old and four, I was that year,
At Rome when Consul Lollius chose Lepidus his peer.

M. Apuleius. P. Silius.

After Cassiodorus, the Consuls that followed for this year, were M. Apuleius and P. Silius. But in Dio, M. Apuleius son of Sexus, and Publius Silius son of Publius Nerva. In the Sicilian records, Apuleius and Nerva.

735

C. Sestius. Q. Lucretius.

THe Colotian Stone, Ensebius in his treatise of Times, Dio and Cassiodorus set forth as Consuls this year, Caius Sestius, son of Caius, Saturninus, and Quintus Lucretius son of Quintus Vespillo. Of this years consuls thus writeth Dio, Caius Sestius was declared Consul: but for that there was to be given him a companion, and Augustus refused the second place of Consulship reserved for him, there arose a sedition, untill Augustus pronounced Consul Quintus Lucretius one of the Embassadors, whom the Senat had sent unto him about the appeasing of the foresaid sedition; notwithstanding he was a man in times past proscribed and outlawed. The same writeth Velleius in the second book. In the broken Colotian stone it is to be read, that the Consul elected instead of Sestius Saturninus, was M. Vinicius son of Marcus Velleius, unto Vinicius adjoyneth as Colleague, Agrippa. In this year, after the first ten years were expired, for which space Augustus together with Agrippa at the first received the Censorian authority and dignity, he was created a second time by the people over-seer of mens behaviour for the term of five years; and resumed the Censors power for the same time, and the Consular authority for ever. So as, at all times, and in all places, he might have twelve Lictors go before him with their bundles of rods, and be allowed to take his place and sit with the Consuls.

Cn. Lentulus. P. Lentulus.

Publius Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Marcellinus: and Cn. Cornelius son of Lucius, are set down for Consuls by the Colotian Stoneable; by Dio also and Cassiodorus. In this year Marcus Agrippa by the motion and authority of the Emperour Caesar Augustus, obtained of the Senat and people of Rome the Tribunitian power for five years.

737

C. Furnius. C. Silanus.

THere succeeded Consuls next, according to Cassiodorus, C. Furnius and C. Silanus. After Dio, C. Furnius son of C. and C. Junius son of Caius Silanus. But in the Colotian fragment C. Furnius son of Caius, and C. Junius. While C. Furnius and C. Junius Silanus were Consuls, the solemn plaies, called Seculares were now the fift time let out by Augustus, as Consortinus and Diocetianus.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls, Lucius Domitius and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and C. Crastinus. Dio, L. Domitius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, a brother bus and P. Cornelius son of P. nephew of Publius Scipio. In like manner the Colotian table, wherein it standeth, that for P. Cornelius there was substituted L. Ta. i.e. Tarius: of whom Pliny in his eighteenth book and seventh chapter writeth thus, L. Tarius Rufus, a man most base for his percentage, parentage, deserved a Consul under Augustus of happy memory, only for his military service. In this Consul year was the Quinquennial solemnity performed, as writeth Dio, in me-moriall of the Empire of Augustus and Agrippa one of the Quindecenvirs, had the ordering and setting out thereof.

739

M. Drusus. L. Piso.

The Consuls next following, were M. Drusus and L. Piso, as Cassiodorus saith. The Sicilian registers name them Libo and Piso. Dio,
 M. Drusus son of Lucius, Drusus Libo; and L.
 Calpurnius son of Lucius Piso, M. Drusus son of Marcus. L. according to the Colotian fragment.)

740

Cn. Lentulus. M. Crassus.

This year next following had for Consuls, after Cassiodorus, and the Sicilian monuments, Cn. Lentulus and M. Crassus whom Dio calleth, M. Licinius son of Marcus Crassus; and Cn. Cornelius son of Cn. Lentulus. The Colotian fragment sheweth Marcus Licinius son of Marcus.

741

T. Nero. Q. Quintilius

Tiberius Nero, and P. Quintilius were Consuls this year, as Cassiodorus reporteth.
 They are named Nero and Quintus in the Sicilian Catalogue. And Dio calleth them Tiberius Claudius son of Tiberius Nero; and P. Quintilius, son of Sextus Varius. The Colotian fragment, Tiberius Claudius son of T. Suetonius writeth, that Tiberius bare his first Consulship but a few daies. For this is that Tiberius Nero, Augustus Casars wives son, who after the death of Augustus, attained to the Empire, having been first by him adopted.

742

M. Messala. P. Sulpitius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Mes-sala and P. Sulpitius. The Sicilian records, Messala and Quirinus. Dio, M. Valerius, son of Marcus, Messala Barbaui; and P. Sulpitius son of Publius Quirinus: of whom Suetonius in Claudius, and Tacitus in his second book write.
 Moreover, this is that Sulpitius Quirinus, who by Josephus in the seventeenth book of antiquities and first chapter, is said to have borne the Consular dignity, and was Lieutenant in Syria.
 At which time, our Lord Jesus Christ the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind, was borne; of whom Saint Luke maketh mention saying, This was the first enrolment or taxation which was made by Quirinus, President and governor of Syria. After these Consuls, others were substituted in their place, as the Colotian stone sheweth, wherein it is thus read:

M. Valerius, M. F.

C. Volgius, C. F.

Suff. C. Caninius.

likewise in Cassiodorus his Catalogue these Consuls are written with their surnames:

Messala Quirinus.

Rebulus Saturninus.

Maximus Tubero.

By which it appeareth that Rebulus and Saturninus were the surnames of Caninius & Volgius.
 By a fragment of the capitol marble, it is evident, that the surnames of Valerius was Em-lianus; of Volgius, Rufus; and Rebulus of Can-ninus: and that as Rufus was put in the place of Valerius, so Rebulus instead of Rufus. There re-mainerh also the memoriall of Rebulus and Saturninus in the Sicilian records. In this year, Dio reporteth, that Augustus was a second time made over-seer for mens manners and demer-itours five years more: and that he resumed still the same authority by cities, as also the Empire, and therein Agrippa died.

743

P. Fabius. Q. Aelius.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth for this years Consuls, Paulus Fabius and Q. Aelius. Dio, Paulus Fabius, son of Quintus Maximus and Tubero. Of Q. Aelius Tubero, and P. Fabius Maximus Consuls, Frontinus speaketh of in his book of water-conduits: and Pliny in his eight book and seventh chapter, where he writeth, that the Theater of Marcellus was dedicated when Quintus Tubero and Fabius Max. were Consuls.

Julius Antonius. Q. Fabius.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls this year;
 Julius Antonius Africanus and Q. Fabius.
 Dio, Jul. Antonius Africanus, and Q. Fabius son of Quintus Maximus. The Sicilian Catalogue and Calender of Cuspinian, shew Africanus and Maximus. Dio nameth Julius the son of Antony-us. Unto him Horace writeth in this manner

Pindarum quisquis fuderit amplexu

Iule, corat eque Dadales

Nisiue pennie, &c.

With wings deuis'd by Dadales

And glaw'd with war, they lica

Whoftrive (Q. Iule) with Pindarus

To match his Poetry.

And after

Touche (Antoni) quous is seen

Antoni

As he doth mount the clouds aloft.

744

Drusus Nero, Titus Quinctius,

There succeeded Coss according to Cassiodorus, Drusus Nero, and T. Quinctius: but after Dio, Nero Claudius, son of Tiberius Drusus; and T. Quinctius, son of Titus Crispinus. Drusus and Crispinus, by Cyprianus Calender and the Sicilian registers. This Drusus brother of Tiberius Nero was Augustus Caesars wives son: who being Consul, died in Germany, and both he and his children had the surname of Germanicus, as Dio writeth: which addition the Senat gave him first of that Province, as Eutropius saith. With the death of this Drusus endeth Livies histories: for thus it is written in the last Epitome, &c. Look in the said Breviary.

To the Reader.

I doubt not but many of them who shall take delight and pleasure in reading the Roman story above-written, will presently grow into a liking of the very place, which hath afforded so worthy persons and rare examples. The love whereof hath moved many a man to undertake a voyage to Rome, only to see the river Tyberis, those seven hills, and the monuments remaining of that famous City. The journey they have found, for way long and tedious: for expence of money heavy and chargeable: for hazard of religion, conscience and good manners, exceeding dangerous: so far degenerate are the inhabitants now from that ancient people, so devout, so vertuous and uncorrupt, in old time. To satisfy the Reader in this behalf, and to avoid the perill of that travell, I thought it not amiss to bring Rome (as it were) home to them, even to represent unto their eye the Topography thereof, that is to say, the description of the places, with the memorable edifices, or rather the ruins of those antique buildings, mentioned in the story aforesaid. And forasmuch as Bartholmew Marlian hath herein taken pains, and made a Treatise thereof, worthy in his conceit to be dedicated unto that noble Prince of famous memory, Francis the French King, the first (I take it) of that name: and for that those learned men, who last set Livy forth in print, have thought good to adjoyne thereto, as a necessary dependant, the foresaid Treatise: I for my part, having struggled with the difficulties of the Alps, and in some sort overcome them: crossed Rhodn, and the Po: passed over the hills Olympus and Aemus, and scrawled through the rough streights of Thetmopylae and Tempe, seem now I would not at my return to stick at the pleasant mount, Palatine, Capitoll, Aventin, &c. with the plains and valleys between, or the river Tyber and Mars field underneath them, beautified especially with such princely Temples, triumphant Arches, glorious Palaces, Theatres, Circuses, Colonnas, and Colosses, wonders of the world. And albeit I found Marlian far unlike himself, and the book that goeth in his name much corrupted in the print, yet by conference with other Authors, I have reformed the fault, and endeavoured that our English edition might in some measure be answerable to the Latine.

A Summary collected by John Bartholmew Marlianus, a Gentleman of Millain, touching the Topography of Rome in ancient time.

The First Book.

CHAP. I.

The situation of the City.

Before we enterpise to shew the edifices and buildings of the City of Rome, somewhat would be premised of the site thereof. Begin therefore we will at the very habitation of the immortal gods: with the invocation of whom, the Poets are wont in every hard and difficult work, to lay their first ground and make their entrance.

The Capitoll hill, where it is broadest, exceedeth not 800 foot: in length it lyeth out toward the Northwest 1500. It hath a point or wing on either side in fashion of a semicircle, and in compasse containeth well-near seven* furlongs.

* Stadia.

From this mount as it runneth out in length, the Palatine hill is divided by a valley of the same breadth, or somewhat more; making a square with four angles of unequall sides, containing 1200 paces. For the one of 600 foot bendeth upon the Capitoline hill: a second of seven hundred foot, bendeth to the Northeast: the third, being almost twice as long, looketh toward the Southeast and the mount Calvus: the fourth, which of all others is biggest, and comprehendeth the lists or shew-place, called Circus Maximus, directly regardeth the Aventine. On the second side thereof there is one plain, reaching from the head and top of the Forum Rom. to the utmost skirt of the hill Quirinalis, which bendeth toward the Suburra, and taketh up in breadth 500 foot: but it lieth out in length almost a mile from both fronts, between the Capitoll, the Forum Nervae, and the mount Calvus: in like manner from the said mount Calvus and Palatine, Suburra and the Esquilina, as far as to the Church of Saint Marcellus. A second plain there is, under under the other point and top of the Capitol, near the Theatre of Marcellus, which stretcheth out 500 foot from the mount it self, as far as to the Tyber; and anon over against the valley from the crooked reach and course of the river, and the nook whereby the Aventine is divided from the Palatine, it spreadeth broader: but afterwards between the said hills it groweth narrow, untill ye come to Calisius and the very gate Capena, where the Aventine is parted from Calisius only by the breadth of the street or high way. The length of this plain is likewise a mile, having on the right hand, Tyber and the Aventine; on the left, Capitoline mount, the Palatine, and Calisius.

Then followeth the mount Calisius (separate from the Palatine by a plain) resembling a pyramidal form of a spire, so as the Bale thereof containeth 500 foot near to the Amphitheatre. Divided also from the same it is by the street Appia, fast by the grand Cirque, which reaching to the gate Capena, leaveth on the left hand a valley 600 foot broad, between Calisius and Calisius lying out in length 4 Stadia, and within a while to the wals which joyn close to the mount Calisius, as far as to the gate Asinaria. This hill then from thence lyeth along the City wall for 4 Stadia, toward the Northeast. From hence the wals meet afront for the space of two Stadia, even to the gate Nevia: from whence as they turn to the Northeast, it is parted from the Esquilie by the street Laticlavia: and anon shewing it self afront near S. Marcellines, it beareth forward as far as to the Amphitheatre. Thus keeping no certain form, it taketh in circuit about 2500 paces. Moreover, the Calisius is enclosed within the said valley, the street Appia, and all along Northeast and Southeast, with the City wals: and hath in compass well near a mile.

The Aventine seemeth to contain two hills: the broader part whereof toward the Tyber, and in like manner in length from Tyber along the wals, and anon near the gate Hofstiensis, is divided and cut with a crooked street-way which leadeth to the angle of the grand Cirque, and the mount Calisius: leaving the other part thereof, divided on the right hand from the mount Calisius by the street Appia, untill you come to the gate Capena. It had in compass 18 Stadia, as Dionysius also testifieth: and on the Southeast, a most spacious and large plain of 4 unequal sides: toward the South containing almost 6 Stadia, Westward five, somewhat less Eastward, but toward the Tyber not above four.

The Esquilie on the South part is divided with the street Laticlavia, on the Northwest, with the valley lying between Calisius, Palatinus, and it self: on the North the Suburra: and from the Viminal hill, the street called Pontius parteth it, untill a man come to the bath of Dioclesian. In circuit it containeth about 4 miles, and hath no certain form: inso much as Varro (not without good reason) thinketh it two hills, and curbeth it into many parts.

The Viminal hill on the West side regardeth the Quirinal, having about a furlong space the plain Suburra lying between: on the North it hath the valley Quirinalis. Between the same hills there lyeth as it were 4 juga in breadth, but about a quarter of a mile in length. And anon it joyneth to the Quirinal and Esquilie along the wall of the City, by a continuall row of many arches, whereby these mountains are made even. The compass thereof taketh up two miles and an half: the form thereof is longwise, and the breadth not in every part alike, but variable.

The Quirinal mount on the left hand, directly from the tower called [Militarium] for the space of 4 Stadia, over-looketh the levell plot of the City which lieth Westward: but on the right hand (as clearly appeareth by that which we have said) it is opposite to the Viminalis: on the third side Northward, for the space of 6 Stadia, it lieth to the hill called [Hortulorum]. It hath a valley lying between, in breadth 4 juga, reaching near to the gate Salaria: and in the whole compass it taketh almost three miles.

Next to it is the little hill Hortulorum, although it standeth without the old pomary of the city: for the space of 3 Stadia it beareth over the valley Martia lying between it and Tyber. It carrieth in length along the wall of the City, from the gate Flumentana to Collina, a full mile more than any other sides. The circumference thereof is much about 18 Stadia.

There remaineth now the mount Janiculus, on the other side of Tyber: the one half thereof, and not above, is contained within the wals: from the Vatican plain, for the space of 3 Stadia, whereas it stretcheth toward the South, it adjoyneth to the river: the other part thereof is enclosed within the wals, for the compass of five Stadia.

Moreover, above the Vatican plain, there is a little hill of the same nature, which putteth forth two points like horns: the one toward Janiculum, the other Northward, much like a bow full bent: the convexity or outward compass whereof containeth a mile.

Now will we run over the plain and base plot of the City: which beginning at the Capitol hill near the gate Flaminia, at this day on the Northeast side (or rather the North) comprehendeth a Diameter or race almost of 8 Stadia, environed with the hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum: but on the West side, the Tyber runneth by it, where along the banks thereof it beareth a greater space. Moreover, by a straight and direct line being drawn for two Stadia from the hill Hortulorum, and namely, where it over-looketh the Piere of Damitian called Naumachia: along the bank of Tyber, over against the Pile Hadriani, it maketh a quadrangle of four uneven sides, containing within it more than three miles: without which square is left the valley Martia, namely, as much as lieth between the hill Hortulorum, the wall of the City, and Tyber: so as the breadth draweth narrower still unto the gate Flaminia.

There resteth yet the Trans-Tyberin region, which together with the Janiculum, taketh in compass about three miles. This will be more easily observed and marked by the very channel of Tyber.

Tyberis; which entering into the city, keepeth his course directly on the right hand of the gate Flaminia through the vale Martia, and soon after by little and little turneth from the North, Westward, and representeth the form of a semicircle, in the convexity whereof is the Vatican, and within the concavity, the Mars field. Moreover, beneath the Moles or pile [Hadriani] returning to his former course, as far as to the utmost foot of the Aventine, winding somewhat crooked into the South, not far from the gate Portuensis it runneth forth of the city.

Thus much concerning the situation and form of Rome, and the plot wherein it standeth, which at this day is so far changed, that hardly a man may find any token or memoriall of it, as it was in old time.

CHAP. II.

Of the founders of the City of Rome, the KK, and Inhabitants thereof.

THE region (on which Rome was after built) West of Tyber, a hundred and forty furlongs distant from the sea, the Sicilians (by constant report) first inhabited. Afterwards, the Aborigines leaving Arcadia, by the conduct of Oenotrius the son of Lycaon, came into the said quarters: and being grown into a liking of the place for the fertility thereof, they expelled the Sicilians, and held it for their own use. In process of time the Pelasgians, a people of Greece, together with the Thessalians, who came to aid the Aborigines against the nations their neighbor borderers, remained also in these parts (with the good will and contentment of the said Aborigines) untill the Trojan war: but they all retained the name of the Aborigines, which prerogative they held because they were the first, that by arms conquered that seignory and kingdom. Long time after, Saturn being chased out of Crete by Jupiter his son, fled into Italy: where he taught Janus the King of the Aborigines the skill of planting vineyards, with the use thereof, and likewise the handling of the sickle: in regard of which good turn, he was freely seoffed by Janus in part of his realm, yea, and after the decease of Janus enjoyed the kingdom alone. After this, the Arcadians, who forsook the city Palantium (as weary of their own native country) and by the leading of Evander, seeking some other place of habitation, arrived at the place where now Rome standeth: received of Faunus the K. of the Aborigines, a portion of ground; built a fort upon a little hill not far from Tyber, and named it Palantium, in remembrance of their native city which they had abandoned. After all this, the Peloponnesians, Phanetians, and Epians, by reason that Elis their native country was wasted before by Hercules, were by him brought away into Italy, and they planted themselves upon the mount Saturnine. These men lived a long time according to their own laws and customs, untill they being vanquished and subdued by the Aborigines, were incorporated by them into one Commonalty. Then reigned Latinus the son of Faunus, untill such time as Aeneas the son of Anchises, after the overthrow and finall ruin of Ilium, after many adventures and much variety of fortune, which he had endured together with the Trojans his companions, came by the instinct of the destinies to K. Latinus. Whose daughter Lavinia he took to wife, and so was by Latinus admitted into the society and fellowship with him of the kingdom. When the Aborigines and the Trojans were thus linked and joyned together, he called both nations by the name of Latines. Then was Aeneas warred upon by Turnus: for that he had married Lavinia, who was espoused and affianced to him before. But Aeneas won the victory, and in single combat slew Turnus. At that time also Latinus died, and left his son in law Aeneas heir to the crown. certain years after was Aeneas killed by Mezentius K. of the Tuscans; and Ascanius his son succeeded in the kingdom. He built the towns Lavinium and Alba: and when he departed this life, made over the crown to his brother Sylvius. After him followed Kings, Aeneas Sylvius, Latinus Sylvius, Alba, Atys, Cappys, Caperus, Tyberinus, Agrippa, Romulus, Aventinus, Procas, and Amulius. This Amulius usurped the kingdom by fraud, which in right of eldership was due to his brother Numitor. And for fear least there might arise from his brothers off-spring, some one to make claim and recover the royall seat, and thereby himself be thrust out of his place, he consecrated Rhea the daughter of Numitor to Vesta, for to be a professed Nun. She being thus made a votary, and devoted to perpetuall virginity, happened to be with child by Mars, and was delivered of two boies, twins, namely, Romulus and Remus. Amulius advertised hereof, commanded both the babes to be cast forth to perish. Found they were by Faustulus a shepherd upon the bank of the river Tyber, and by his wife Faustula fostered and brought up among other shepherds. Remus being grown to mans estate, was taken by certain thieves and robbers, and brought to K. Amulius his great-uncle. Accused he was, for that he used to raise booties and drive away whole droves of Numitor his cattell. Whereupon delivered he was to Numitor for to be punished according to his discretion. But Remus after much discourse of speeches to and fro, was by certain tokens found and known to be Numitor his daughters son. And at the very time came Romulus also with Faustulus in place, purposing to rescue Remus his brother. Soon they expired into a conspiracy, and at unawares surprized and murdered Amulius: and so restored their grandsire Numitor. In the second year of Numitor his reign, Romulus and Remus built the City of Rome, in the very place where they had been laid forth to perish, which was the 432 year after the winning of Troy, and the twelfth day before the calends of May. Afterwards in a fray that arose between Romulus and Remus striving for the sovereignty, Remus came by his death, and then Romulus gave name both to the City and Citizens also of Rome.

CHAP. III

The form and bigness of the City of Romulus.

Romulus set out the City four square, as Plinarch witnesseth: whereupon of some it is called Quadrata. Others affirm, that the form and compass thereof is uncertain, and by reason of Antiquity unknown at this day. The hill Palatinus was by Romulus first fortified, because therein he was brought up: at the foot thereof began the Pomerium. Afterwards the Capitol and the Roman Forum were laid to it.

The City began to be marked and bounded out from the beast-market: from whence in certain places were stories pitched and set between, along the bottom of the mount Palatinus as far as to the altar of Consus: and so within a while to the old Curia: then, to the Chappell of the Lares and the Roman Forum the bounds were extended, untill a place was assigned for the walls, and a spacious plot to build the City upon.

Titus Tatius began the wall from the rock Carmentalis, and brought it to the way, which is not far from Tyber. From thence Southward unto the farthest part of the grand Circus: and so Northward he ranged it into the Forum of Nerva: and in the end joyned it to one of the points of the Capitol hill, and within it compassed both the Capitol itself, and also the Palatine. And finally, to enlarge the City, he set so to the hills Quirinalis and Colinus.

The gates of Romulus his City.

Romulus when he died, left the City of Rome with three gates, namely, Carmentalis, Roman, and Pandana. Others add a fourth thereto, to wit, Janualis.

Carmentalis took the name of Carmentis, the mother of Evander, whose Chappel Carmentalis stood before the gate. This gate stood under the Capitol on the right hand, between the cliff Tarpieus and the Tyber, over-against the Church now of S. Katharine, toward the shew-place Flamininus. This was afterwards named Scelerata, for that without this gate, in the Temple of Janus, the act of Senat passed for the sending of the three hundred Fabii to Cremora, who went forth at this gate, and were slain every one at Cremora.

Roman was so called of Romulus: built it was where now the gardens are belonging to the new Church of S. Mary not far from the angle of the mount Palatinus in the bottom of the cliff of Vulturna. Some affirm that this gate was afterwards called Mugonia, of the lowing of kine and oxen: others name it Trigonis, of three corners that it had.

Pandana was so named, because it stood open for things to be brought through it into the City. The same also was called Libera, or Romulida. The place for it they assigned where the gate Satur-nalis stood, bearing the name of the old City so called and after destroyed.

Janualis carried the name of the Temple Janus, which is not far off. It stood sometime at the very foot of the hill Viminalis.

CHAP. V

The variety of the compass and walls of the City.

When the Romans one while made war upon their neighbor nations of Italy, and other-whiles defended themselves against their violence, it hapned for the most part that they got the upper hand, and ever as they vanquished any and subdued them under their subjection, in the end made them Citizens of Rome: by which occasion, the City built by Romulus, was not sufficient to receive so great a multitude. Tullius therefore after his conquest of the Sabins and Albans laid to the City the mountain Colinus and the Esquilia, and so enlarged it. Afterwards, when Politorium was won, and a number of the inhabitants translated to Rome, Ancus made a second enlargement of the City, and granted these new comers the mount Aventinus to inhabit. The old Romans therefore dwelt in Palatinus: the Sabins in Capitolium: the Albans in Colinus: and this new come multitude in Aventine. But after the Latines also were received into the City, they joyned Janiculum also to the city by a wooden bridge made over the Tyber: and cast a trench called Fossa Quirinalis, about the low and level places of the city. So the Trans-tyberine quarter was united to the city, and made it more spacious and stately: last of all, Servius Tullius by adjoyning the hills Viminalis and Quirinalis to the five abovenamed, amplified the city. And as before it was mounded about with rubbish, and the same rudely laid, Tarquin the proud was the first that enclosed it with a wall of good ashler stone. And the very same walls, which stand at this day, were by the posterity that followed, repaired and reedified upon the old foundations. But the city in old time, when as it flourished in greatest glory, extended far more in bounds and compass. For in Plinius time the circuit thereof within the wall contained about 20 miles. But in these daies hardly 12. And the whole compass of the city, with the suburbs and buildings about and without the walls (which although they spread far, were comprehended yet under the name of city) in the said Plinius time, was 30 miles.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

The Pomary of the City.

That void space of ground within and without the walls, which might not lawfully be either ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomary. And sometime it is put for the circuit of the whole City. This Pomary was oftentimes let out farther, and altered by the Roman Emperors. But none had power granted so to do, save only they that either conquered somewhat to the Roman dominion, or endowed the City with some singular and especial benefit: as the Emperor Claudius and many more. And like as the Romans had no certain limits of their Empire, so no set bounds confined either the City or the Pomary.

CHAP. VII.

The gates of old Rome, which at this day are not to be seen: those also that are now extant.

Even as the bounds of the City and Pomary were many times altered, so the gates also: some were left within the City, by occasion that the walls were farther let out and lost their names: others in time were so old, that they fell down, and albeit their name remain, yet the place where they stood is not known. Some again were made new, and took either new names, or else kept their old: others changed the place, and held their old name: and finally, there were some that had two names: and others, more. And these in manner were all the names of the gates:

Flumentana, or Flaminia.

Quirinalis, Agonenfis, or Collina.

Nomentana, or Viminalis.

Janualis, or Sabias, leading into the Sabins country.

Esquilina, or Taurina.

Navia, or Laticlana.

Capena, or Appia.

Calimontana, or Asinaria.

Tergemina, or Hofienfis.

Portuensis, or Navalis.

Ratumena, or Vientana.

Triumphalis, or Patricana.

Carmenalis, Maronia, Pandana, Querquetulana, Raduscula, Saginati, Saucnalis, Collatina, Interagares, Tiburtina, Gabinfa, Latina, Aurelia, Calatiana, Laurentia, Fontinalis, Lavinialis, Ferentina, Minutina, Salutaria, Mutia, Piccularis, Preneftina, Libitinenfis, Valeria, and Tarpeia.

Flumentana took name of the river Tiberis: for it stood at the first upon the bank of that river, not far from the bridge of Xystus, in the end of the Broad street, and at the head of the way, or street Flaminia: but afterwards, translated it was to the place where now it standeth. In time following, it was called Flaminia, of the cauley of Flaminius: at this day it is named, The peoples gate, and is situate in the hill Hortulorum.

Collatina bare the name of Collatia, a town not far from Rome: now it is Pinciana, of one Pincus, a Senator, whose name it keepeth. This also standeth in the hill Hortulorum: between it and Flumentana is a mile space.

Quirinalis took name of the Chappel of Quirinus: or because in old time the way lay through it, for them that went to the hill Quirinalis. It seemeth to be called Agonenfis, quasi Agony, i.e. without a corner; afterwards, Collina: and at the last, Salaria: for that by it salt was carried into the City. This name it holdeth still, and standeth 6 Stadia from Collatina.

Viminalis is from Quirinalis distant 5 Stadia; so named, as they say, of a wood of Ofiers, which (as it is supposed) sometime grew thereby: or else of a Chappel of Jup. Viminis. This also then called Figulensis, of the potters works made without it: but now they name it the gate of S. Agnes, and Nomentana.

Interagares standeth in the Plain Viminalis, between the gate Viminalis and Esquilina: it had the denomination of Tarquinius his mures and banks, among which it was built.

Tiburtina stood between Esquilina and Nomentana, so as it was 12 Stadia distant from Esquilina, upon the plain of Esquilie in the very place where the conduit is of the Mary water.

Esquilina took that name of the hill Esquilie, the same in ancient time was called Taurina, of a bulls head there found: for many a day, after, was the said bulls head seen painted in the inner front of the said gate. At this day, S. Laurence gate.

Navia drew the name of certain groves or woods near adjoining. In times past Laticlana, and now Major. An arch there was so called, and erected in the same place by the old Romans.

Calimontana, standing from Navia 8 Stadia, seemeth by a finity of name to be so called of the hill Calus, in the edge whereof it standeth: and Asinaria it was called, of the Asses which were wont to be sent out to Naples, by that gate. At this time they call it S. Johns gate.

Gabinfa, built close to the mount Calus, South-east: which seemeth by all likelihood to take the name of the City Gabii, which it directly regardeth. It carried the name also Morodium, of measuring, and is situate from Calimontana, as it were 5 Stadia.

Latina is 5 Stadia likewise from Gabinfa, seated not far from the Church of S. John Baptist: so called, for that men go forth of it into Latium.

Capena is so named of the Capenas, a Latin nation, against which it lyeth. This also is called still Camana, of a grove and Chappel of the Muses, built just before the same gate. Appia likewise, of the high-way Appia; which Appius the Centor paved, and so it bare his name. They call it also also Triumphalis, for that in triumph the pomp is that way carried with state. Of some it is named Pontialis, for the plenty of springs there. At this day S. Sebastian's gate.

Tergemina took that name of an old gate so called, at which the 3 twins Romulus went forth against their enemies, and gave the first name to it. Some shew remaineth yet of this gate to be seen, near the Salina.

Hostiensis, was in ancient daies so called, for that it led to the City Hostia: now S. Paul's gate: situate it is from Capena well near 8 Stadia.

Portuensis is a gate beyond the Tyber, within half a Stadium of the said river: so called, for that it leadeth to the haven of Hostia. Now a daies men call it, Porta ripa, i. The bank gate.

Aurelia, looketh toward Janiculum: distant from the former almost 7 Stadia. In this age they call it S. Pancrace gate.

Aelia, was built by Elivus Hadrianus, of whom it took that name.

Septimiana, bare the name of Septimius the Emperor: and because it standeth under Janiculum, is at this day called, Subura Janum. Some affirm, that this is Fontialis, because out of the mount called Aureus, there issue fountains: for to the said hill this gate standeth close. From it to Aurelia are 5 Stadia: and to the river Tyber 7 jugera or acres.

Thus much for the gates of the City of Rome, and their names.

The wall in old time had upon it 360 towers. Some of these are decayed and gone: others repaired, and many this long time are ready to fall.

NOW is it time, and the course of the Story doth require, that leaving the towrs and walls, we enter into the City, and shew the beginning and the place of those edifices, which within the walls, either upon the hills or the plain plot of the City, were built by men in old time. First therefore, begin we will at the worthiest earthly habitation of all their Gods, to wit, the Capitol.

The second Book

CHAP. I.

The sundry names of the Capitol.

THE Capitol was by the old Romans called Mount Saturnius, either of a City named Saturnia, which under the very hill was built in that place where now Rome standeth: or because Saturn in times past dwelt in that hill: onelic (as some think) for that the mount it self had Saturn for the tutelar God and Protector thereof. But afterwards it was named the mount Tarpeius, of the Virgin Tarpeia, of whom Livy writeth. Last of all, Tarquinius Priscus going in hand to build upon that hill a temple to Jupiter, when he digged for to lay the foundation, chanced to find in the bottom of the trench a man's head: whereupon they called it Capitolinus. And the Augurs being sought unto and demanded: What the finding of that head might signify? answered, That this Castle should be the See of the empire and the head of the whole world. This hill they divide into the Castle and the Capitol. The Castle they built Northward, as a stronger and more fortified place: but the Capitol, toward Tyberis, a place naturally defended.

CHAP. II.

Who first laid the foundation of the Capitol: who finished it: how often it was burnt, and by whom reedified.

IN the Sabine war, Tarquinius Priscus vowed to build the Capitol temple: but after the war was ended, so soon as he had laid the ground-work, he died. After him, Tarquinius Superbus finished the building, of a square stone, and decaied the charges thereof out of the pillage of Pometia, a Town that he won. When he for his tyranny was banished Rome, Lucius Postumus the Consul dedicated the said Capitol to Jupiter. It stood upright and sound for the space of 415 years, until the Marian wars, and then (in the Consulship of Sulpio and Marius) it was consumed with fire. Sylla re-edified it, and Q. Caecilius consecrated it: and so it continued until the Vitellian war. During which troubles, it was a second time burnt, at what time it stood with the doors shut, undefended, and not rised. Vespasian built it again, and in his life, a third time it was decaied by fire: and together with the Capitol, Vespasian also himself died. Afterwards, Domitian re-built it in more magnificent and stately manner than it had been ever before, and disbursed therein above 12000 talents. Of the Capitol towers and pinacles, the flames and images smitten with thunder-bolts, and blasted oftentimes with lightning, divers writers have made mention.

CHAP. III.

The Temple of Jup. Feretrius, of Jup. Opt. Max., of Juno, and Minerva.

THE Capitol, Cicero calleth The house and habitation of the gods, because it contained the chappels, flames, and images in manner of all the gods: but the first of all other in Rome was that of Jupiter Feretrius, vowed by Romulus in the war against the Caenians. After which war ended, and he returned to Rome with victory, he reared a temple in the very pitch and top of the capitol hill. But Jupiter was by Romulus named Feretrius, as some would have it; for that Jupiter assisted him in striking the enemy, in that very place where he vowed the temple. Or else, because the Romans used in making of peace, to swear by his scepter and the flint. The roof of this Church fell down for very age and through neglect of the Romans. Augustus repaired. This temple first built by Romulus, was afterwards enlarged by Ancus Martius.

But the temple of Jup. Opt. Max. of all other was the greatest and most renowned. This also was called Capitolium; and Targ. Priscus vowed it. After him, Targ. Superbus expended in the foundation thereof 40000 pound weight of silver; but before that he finished it, he was deprived of his Kingdom for his tyranny, and left the work unperfect to be accomplished by the Romans. Built it was upon the hanging of the Capitoline hill toward Tyberis, as hath been shewed before. For the form, the greatness and beauty of this temple, read Dionysius and sundry other authors, who have written of the Roman acts and of Rome it self. Upon the top or lantern thereof, stood Summanus the God, made of potters earth, whose head was smitten with lightning and fell into Tyberis. It had within it besides, a sanctuary or secret chappel, which no Lay person might enter into. Within the said cell or chappel, were two coronets of gold: the one of them the Gauls consecrated to Jup. Opt. Maximus; the other, the Carthaginians sent to Rome in the honor of Jupiter, in token of joy for their victory over the Samnites. Moreover, in the said temple were other three chappels, to wit, one of Jup. Opt. Max. in the midst; a second of Minerva on the right hand; and a third of Juno on the left. And because men in old time attributed unto Minerva the invention of numbers, a law was set down in writing, That the chief and highest Pretor for the time being, should drive a spike or great nail near unto her image, whereby the computation of the years might be known. This so rich and costly edifice, was burnt all at once in the Vitellian war. Now at this day the place wheras it stood, is prophane: howbeit there remain yet to be seen, some tokens thereof, and the foundations; but all deformed and broken peecemeal.

CHAP. IV.

The Temples of Saturn, Jupiter Tonans, Jupiter Custos, of Fortune, of Vejovis, Mercy, Juno Moneta, and of Janus. The sepulchre of Orestes, the common Treasury, the house of Manlius, and chappel of Carmenta.

Since that we have described the temple of Jupiter K. of the Gods, in what place it was situate, and by whom built; meet it is to make report also of other gods in order, who had their houses in the capitol: and first of Saturn, Jupiter's father.

Saturn in old time had an altar erected unto him in the very way as ye go out of the Forum up to the capitol, as some think. There is that would have this temple or altar of Saturn, built by the companions of Hercules: others again say, that Tunius reared it. But of this variety in opinion of Writers, this may be the reason, because some affirm, that there were two temples consecrated to Saturn, but reared in divers places and at several times: one at the rock of Carmenta, even before the capitoline cliff (wherein the bones also of Orestes brought from Archia were bestowed); the other in that very place, where now standeth the chappel of S. Savinour: where yet at this day there is a turret to be seen, which they call, the Tower in Erarium: for there first was the common treasure house of Rome. In the temple of Saturn, dedicated by Caecilius Lucatius, there stood Ianus with four faces; signifying the four times of the year: of whom the first month January took name.

The temple of Jupiter Tonans Augustus Caesar first built, on the capitoline cliff or side of the hill, South-east; upon this occasion: It happened, that in the Cantabrian expedition, as he was carried by night in a litter, the lightning slightly glanced thereupon, and killed the servant that was the guide; and therefore he both vowed this temple, and also finished it to the honor of Thundering Jupiter. A temple also to Fortune was built not far from it.

The temple of Vejovis stood between the castle and the capitol, in that part where now the chappels are to be seen of consecrations. In old time they called this Idol-devil, Vejovis, because he was deprived of all power to help and do good. To him they sacrificed a she goat: because he held arrows in his hand, most men thought he was Apollon.

Asylum, that is to say, the temple of Mercy stood likewise upon the capitol hill, near a shadowy grove, in the very valley amid the capitol, and the castle. Called it is the temple Intermentium, between two cities. This, Romulus erected, that what offender soever thither fled, he should be privileged as in a sanctuary. But Tyberius afterwards, supposing that this place afforded occasion of mischief, deprived it of that liberty. This Asylum, by report, the posterity of Hercules first erected.

The temple (as also the mint-house) of Juno Moneta, was built upon that plot of ground, where sometime stood the house of M. Manlius. This chappel, some report that L. Furius vowed; others, that L. Cicereius the Pretor; and Ovid, that Camillus. Now was Juno called Moneta, of giving warning: for that from the very place where afterwards the temple was set, there was a voice heard of Juno, admonishing them of the future overthrow by the Saturnes. In this place now standeth a Senators house of Rome.

The

The temple of Janus keeper of the Capitoline castle, stood in that place, whereat that day is the goal and prison for malefactors and fellows, toward the Southwest, over against the Forum Romanum. This Janus upon the Capitol, Romulus and Tatius devised to have two faces presenting thereby the two nations. Others would have him to be painted a faced for his cunning and providence: for he was the first that invented the toiall crown; also boats; the skill of navigation; brassen coin and many other things. Janus took that name ab annis, of going, for that he turneth about the heaven and all things else. For which cause he also named Versutinus. In old time they beleevd there was but one Janus; but posterity in later age, have imagined more.

The temple of Jupiter Custos, Domitian (after he was invested in the empire) built; and placed his own image in the lap and bosome of that god. It stood where at this day the Salara or fairpud are, near to the temple of Janus.

CHAP. V.

The temple of gods which have no certain place now in the Capitol.

Among those gods, whose determinat place assigned to them in the Capitol, is not known where it was, the first was Terminus, as to whom in all the world throughout, there is no proper place appointed. Now this Terminus was a rude and formless stone. Unto him Tatius first vowed a temple; and some say, that Numa dedicated it. How ever it be; no doubt verily ancient it was, as easily may be collected by that which followeth. But why, that in the Capitol was of men in old time reputed for a god, this was the cause: when Tarquinius Superbus determined to build a temple to Jupiter, he consulted with the Augurs about the place, because he would begin nothing without the approbation of the birds. They shewed unto him the mount Tapeius, but this place was already taken up with other gods, whose chappels there, were consecrated and hallowed. These therefore were by certain sacrifices to be conjured out from thence, for to give way to Jupiter, and to be transited into some other quarter. All the gods willingly yielded their places up to Jupiter as their King, only Terminus refused to be displaced; and so remained there still. When he had finished the temple and fore-part of the roof which regardeth the said stone, was left naked and open for that god, as who neither ought nor could be enclosed, the augures therefore being sought unto and demanded; For what reason Terminus alone abode still with Jupiter, when all the other gods were gone? made answer, that thereby signified, that together with religion, their empire also was eternall. To this god they sacrificed not but in open air and publicly abroad; as being the god and keeper of bounds. Saint Augustine witnesseth, that Mars also and Jupiter together with Terminus, would not agree to give place to Jupiter: for that the dominion of Rome should not be bounded out, nor yet decay with age and continuance of time.

To Mars and Venus Ericeia, Attulus and Q. Fab. Max. being Duumvirs, dedicated chappels upon the Capitol, severed asunder by one vault or cistern.

To queen Juno, C. Flaminius in the Ligurian war, vowed a temple.

To Ops, Tatius the King, consecrated a temple; for that she is called the earth, and is the mother of all things, as bringing forth all, and receiving all again. The same Ops is called Maia, Fauna, and Bona Dea. This temple was blasted with fire from heaven, as Livy testifieth.

Mars revenger, Augustus Caesar erected a temple upon the Capitol, within the hill Saturninus.

To Faith, on the same hill, Attulus Collatinus dedicated another.

To Health, Concord, Liberty, and Victory, they built temples: and many there were within the city erected to Concord.

To Fortuna Primigenia and Obsequence, Tullus dedicated a temple.

To Venus bald they also set up a temple in the Capitol, in memoriall and everlasting praise of the Roman dames, for willingly parting with the hair from their heads, toward the making of engine, that during the Gauls war, were devised and made against the enemies.

Tarquinius Superbus built a temple to Jupiter Sponsor, and Sp. Posthumius dedicated it. Likewise to Jupiter. After the old Romans consecrated a temple in the Capitol.

CHAP. VI.

Of the statues which either in old time were or now remain in the Capitol.

OF statues in old time were sundry sorts, and the same made of divers matter: some of marble; some of brass, some of silver, and others of gold. Many of these were set up in the Capitol to the immortal gods for divers causes; and namely, for their benefits bestowed upon mankind; which a long time were honoured and worshipped. To noble men likewise and such as had deserved well of the common-weal, the usual manner was in old time to set up statues and images in the temples, to provoke others by their example to do the like.

To Jupiter in the Capitol, Sp. Carvilius erected a statue in his temple, after he had vanquished the Samnites, taking the proportion or form thereof by the pattern of Jupiter Latiarius his image. Florus maketh mention, that this statue was smitten with lightning. He also set up another to thundring Jupiter.

The old Romans set up in the temple of Jup. Ops. Max. statues to Victory and Faith, to either of them one.

For Nemesis also was an image erected in the Capitol, for that this goddess punished proud and faithlesse persons. She is named also Rhamnusia of Rhamnus a village in Attica, where she was worshipped: & Adraffe, of Adraffus, who was the first that built a temple in the honor of her.

Unto Hercules, for his notable and famous act, they erected many statues in the Capitol: and namely, Pub. Sulpicius and Pub. Sempronius one; and Q. Fabius Max. another, which he brought from the Tarentins by him subdued.

The images of good Event, and good fortune (the workmanship both of Praxiteles) were within the Capitol.

The image of Apollo with a diadem, and his Colossus thirty cubits high, in the making whereof were bestowed 140 talents, Lucullus translated out of Apollonia in Panonia, into the Capitol.

An image there was of Janus likewise in the Capitol, holding in his right hand the number of 300 and in his left of sixty five, to signifie the daies of the year.

Two golden statues of Castor and Pollux, were by the Emperor Claudius of famous memory, dedicated in the temple of Jupiter.

The counterfeits resembling the rivers, Nileus and Tygris, half naked, were set up in the forefront of the temple of Conseruatores: the one carry upon the shoulders, Sphinx; the other a Tygre; two wild beasts: both of them hold in their right hand Cornucopia, which signifieth plenty.

The personage of Hercules portrayed naked, of brasie and double gault, without beard, holding in his right hand a club, and in the left the golden Apples of Hesperides, was found neer the Greek school and the beast market, in the ruins of Ara Maxima.

There be certain portraiture also of the Parthian and Dacian triumphs, enclosed within walls which were taken out of the church now called S. Martina.

TO Scipio they erected in the Capitol, a statue * wearing a souldiers cassock and slippers or pants, in regard of his victory over Antiochus, for an everlasting memorial of his worthy deeds.

To Sylla there was also a statue erected in the Capitol, in habit of a footman.

For Emilius Lepidus, when he was but a boy, the people of Rome set up a statue, because he had in a battel vanquished the enemy, and saved a Citizen.

The like honour to the rest they did to Metellus, for that he had preserved out of the temple of Vesta, being on fire, the image of Pallas.

They erected an image to Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi, in recompence of a benefit of hers for that in a great dearth of corn, she serued the people at 3 farthings a Modius. The same they did to Trebius the Edile.

Fabius Maximus made for himself a cast or molten image, and erected it just by that of Hercules.

Unto Brutus, for delivering Rome from the tyranny of Tarquinius, the Romans erected his image in the midst of the KK. statues.

Domitian would not suffer any image of his to be erected, unlesse it were of molten silver or gold, and of a certain weight.

The emperor Commodus took off the head from the coloss of Nero, & set upon it his own statue which he had in the Capitol. This Colossus is to be seen broken as it was, in the houses of Conseruatores.

In the said houses of Conseruatores, is extant yet the brasen portraiture of a she-wolf, at whose teats, Romulus and Remus, the first founders of Rome, are to be seen how they hang sucking.

The image of Romulus and Remus remained in the Capitol, resembling two youths: the one, standing upon the feet in servil habit and attire: the other sitting like a shepherd or herdman, bending forwards with the body, plucking a thorn out of the sole of his foot, which rankled and festered withall.

An infinit number of statues were in the Capitol, of gods especially, brought from other parts to Rome. For the Romans robbed the churches of forreign nations, for to enrich and adorn their own.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Capitol cliff, Tarpeia rock, the fane of Cerments, and the gate Stereoraris.

IN old time, they called that place and way whereby men go up to the Capitol, Clivus Capitolinus: but where that place was in times past, sundry opinions there be. Some affirm, that it lay toward that part of the hill which looketh on the Auentinus, where now standeth S. Gregories Church in Velabrum: others betwixt the temples of Saturnus and Concordia, neer to the arch of Severus, and at the stile and standings, called Sanatoria Stabula. Now the arch of Severus was raised at the foot of the Capitol hill, in the very head and top of Forum Romanum: under which they passed, that in triumph ascended up into the Capitol. The Capitol cliff then, was neer unto the Roman Forum: which by the Censors was paved with flint: who also set up a gallerie from the Chappell of Saturn unto the Capitol Temple close to the Senaculum and the Curia over it. Corn. Tacitus writeth, that in former times there were many avenues and waies upon the Capitol, and thereupon arose so many and divers opinions concerning the Clivus Capitolinus. In the place of the feast Floralia was in old time celebrated, whereof some tokens remain at this day to be seen. In it stood Milos house, which was full of shields and other armor, Cicero maketh report.

Sanaculum

That place was called Tarpey rock which standeth over the Forum Romanum: from whence in times past felonious malefactors found guilty, were pitched down head-long, and wherein at this day offenders are punished.

Carmen stone, regardeth Tyberis, just over-against the Senators bridge.

The Dung-gate called Sutoraria stood upon the Capitol cliff aforelaid; thither was throwd out all the fifth rid out of the temple of Vesta, for to be caried away and soon after to be cast into the Tyberis.

CHAP. IX.

Of tables, of the brasen columns or pillars, and of the silver Goose.

IN the Capitol there were two sorts of tables; the one of Pictures containing the noble acts or battels, with the siege and assault of Cities, exploited by valiant martial men. For some of them were so desirous of praise and renown, that they could not be content to behold their own statues erected in the Capitol, unlesse their acts were described also and depainted in tables set up in publick place; and by that means left their glory behind them, commended likewise to posterity. Another kind there was of tables, wherein were written in the most ancient laws, to wit, of Romulus, Numa, and the other KK. Likewise the statues of the later lawgivers: the publick acts and ordinances; the leagues and covenants with other nations; the sacred rites and divine service, and the ancient records and monuments, which were engraven and cut in brasen tables: of which, some at this day are extant; others by continuance of time, by war, fire, and carelesse negligence are lost and perished. For the keeping of these, there were certain persons appointed, that in so serious and important matters, there should be no forgery and corruption.

Pillars likewise of brasen, were by Domitian set up in the Capitol; the which, Augustus the conqueror of Egypt, caused (of many brasen beak heads of ships molten together) to be made into four huge columns, and brought them to Rome. Sylla likewise took out of Imperi temple in Athen, certain brasen pillars, brought them to Rome, & there consecrated them to Jupiter in the Capitol.

The Portraiture of a goose in silver, was set up within the Castle by the Romans for perpetual memory, because a goose by gagging gave warning of the enemies coming, to the warders of the castle and thereby saved the Capitol. For which cause geese a long time after, were fed & kept in Rome at the Cities charges. There are besides, many other antiquities within the Capitol, cut in tables of brasen and marble both, and namely, Epitaphs, which here for brevities sake are left out.

CHAP. X.

Of certain edifices and buildings upon the Capitol hill, and of other things in general.

NOW that we have made declaration of the statues, tables, and columns, worth the noting, something by the way would be said in the place, as touching the ancient houses there. The Court called Calabra Curia, Romulus built the Capitol, and covered it with reed. Into this place the King-sacrificer was wont to assemble the Senat and people of Rome, that from him they might learn and know the daies of solemn game, plaies, and sacrifices.

Not far from the said Curia, was the cottage of Romulus.

And almost the same place stood the stately porch or gallery of Metellus and Constantinus. The Library also called Majorum, built artificially upon marbles pillar: and besides the publick court-yard.

There was an hallowed place likewise upon the Capitol, from whence they gathered Verbens, or sacred herbs, to make garlands for the facials, heralds and the Paterbaratus: wherewith they were crowned when they purposed either to make any accord and peace, or to proclaim war.

The flint stone also was here found, which they held in their hand when they swore by Jupiter, pronouncing these words, If I made default with my knowledge, then let Dielpiter cast me out of all that I have (saving the City and the castle) as I hurl from me this stone.

The Capitol had certain vaults like cisterns, into which were thrown all things over-worn, or so old that they were good for nothing. The six steeds drawing in one team, were there to be seen, which Cicero Cornelius set up, the twelve gilded shields likewise, made of that money wherein the Edils condemned and fined the corn-mongers that hoarded and kept in their corn. The shield also Marcius, set out with the image of Asarubal, and the column garnished with ship beak-heads of brasen, whereof Livy speaketh, were here to be seen. Within the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus there were short cloak or mantle and purple wollen, to which, of other purple garments were laid, they the wed the colour of ashes in regard of the excellent bright glois and lustre that it caried. A present this was (by report) given to Aurelianus by a Persian K. who had it from the farthest Indians. The lintell, cheeks and sill of the Capitol dore, were made all of brasen. The brasen tiles likewise upon the roof, Q. Cincinnatus gilded over the place where Numa took his auguries was on the Capitol; but Tatius used rather the castle cliff: where also stood some time the house of Mausolus, but alterward, thereupon was built the chappel of Juno Moneta. The books also of Sibylla were kept in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, by ten Wardens in a stone cether under the ground. Over & besides so many edifices were there, so beautiful was the Capitol, and the riches thereof so great, so many goodly ornaments and shrines of the gods most artificially wrought, that right worthily of men in old time, it was called the earthly habitation of the gods & Jupiter himself. For during the upright and flourishing state of Rome; so curiously built and richly beautified it was: that as heaven surpasseth the earth, so far this edifice went beyond all other works and wonders whatsoever of the world; inso much as it seemed to have been built by the gods: so far surmounted it all the device and reach of mans wit. But as excellent as these things sometimes were, now at this day they are to be seen, all naked, forlorn, and desolate.

CHAP. XI.

The Temple of Concord, and Jupiter Stator: moreover what the Curia is.

Between the Capitol hill and mount Palatine, there lyeth a valley, whereof we have spoken before. The Temples and buildings wherof, as also the places behind the Capitol, by order and course we are now to describe. In this valley therefore the temple of Concord deserved to be visited first: which word, being derived (as it were) from the unity and agreement of heart, maintaineth, augmenteth, and preserveth alone, all things in the world whatsoever.

A temple to this Concord, Camillus vowed, in case he could reconcile the Commons to the Nobles. When as therefore the people were brought into grace and favour again with the Nobility, he built the church of Concord, beginning above the Comitum and so forward unto the Forum. The porches belonging to this temple, are yet to be seen at the foot of the Capitol. From it, there was an ascent of an 100 steps up to the chappel of Juno Moneta. That temple of Concord, slain in long time to decay, was afterwards by the Senat reedified. Therein many a time the Senat met and sat in counsell, and orations were made unto the people. In this also there was a vault or shroud under the ground, wherein oftentimes thieves, armed men, cutters and hacksters were kept as in a prison, untill the assemblies of the people were dismissed. This house had many statues and images curiously and cunningly wrought, namely, of Juno, Apollo, and of Latoa, bearing and holding her two babes Apollo and Diana. Like wife of Esculapius and Hygiea, the handy-work of Niceratus. Also of Jupiter Cereus, and Minerva: likewise of the Dames weeping and adoring the said images all made of Stones. Moreover, the images of Mars and Mercutus; the workmanship of Pisicratus. Also of Marsyas bound, made by Zenas the painter. Likewise father Liber and Cassandra, painted by Theodorus. As for the image of Victory in the porch and entrance of the said temple, it is to be seen how it was smitten with a thunderbolt.

To Jupiter Stator, Romulus in the Sabine war vowed a temple, that he might stay the flight of the Romans: whereupon he was called, the upholder of the Roman state. Therefore after victory obtained, he built a temple at the foot of the Palatine hill, just over-against the church of Concordia, where at this day be most high bartlements of wals. In this house also, like as in that other of Concord, the Senat assembled oft. Like wife in other temples. The courts, wherein the Senat gathered together in Council, were temples all, and therein were there acts made: but in the sacred churches of the gods, neither met the Senat, nor any orations were made to the people. This temple of Stator was burnt to the ground in that fire of Nero making, and never after reedified.

CHAP. XII.

The temple and grove of Vesta: the temple of Faith and of Romulus.

The temple of Vesta was built by Romulus, between the Capitol and the Palatine hills, not far from the Forum Romanum; where at this day is to be seen, the church of S. Mary of graces. Neer unto it the palace of Numa was built. The Roman Pontifices, when they would consult of great matters concerning religion, met in the court-yard of Vesta; like as the Senat and people of Rome, debated in council of their weightiest affairs within the temple of Faith. Now this was a most ancient temple built in Palatium by Romulus, or, as some will have it, by Numa.

There was a grove also consecrated to Vesta, which reached from the root of the Palatine, as far as to the large street called Nova via. Out of that grove (before Rome was taken by the Gauls) a voice was heard, giving warning that the City should be lost, unless the wals and gates were repaired.

The temple of Romulus was seated at the foot of mount Palatine, in the midst of that side which regardeth the Capitol, in that very place were now the church is of S. Theodorus. In this said temple there is a most ancient monument, the portraiture of the she wolf, yeelding her teats unto the founders of the City, to be sucked.

CHAP. XIII.

Lupercal, and the fether Romulus.

The Lupercal was a cave at the bottom of the Palatine hill, overspread and covered with trees, having springs deep beneath under the rock. In the most inward and secret place of this cave there there was an altar consecrated to Pan. But touching the etymology and derivation of the name, as also of the situation thereof, there go divers opinions: for as in times past the place was close hidden and unfrequented, so now it is inhabited on every side: in so much as there remaineth no mark and token at all where Lupercal was. Howbeit the greater part of writers affirm, that it was in that quarter of the City, where at this day S. Theodors church is seen. For to this place upon a time the Tyber overflowing, made a creeke thither: and hard by it was, where the two infants were cast forth. In the Lupercal therefore, certain authors confidently avouch, that Romulus and Remus were laid to perish, and so carried by water to the place called afterwards Ruminalis, were under a fig-tree there, nourished by a she wolf. This wolf haunted & kept in the den called Lupercal, & from thence ran to the bank side under the fig-tree Ruminalis for to the suckle the said babes, and so gave the name unto the cave to be called Lupercal, as it were the lurking hole and den of the wolf. There be again that would have Evander to give the name to the same hollow cave: for he, as is before declared, was descended from Arcadia, where the people after most ancient rites and ceremonies, do right devoutly worship Pan, the god of herdmen. Unto whom also a mountain in Arcadia to him dedicated, was called Lycans, for that he keepeth, λύκος, i. wolves from the sheep, and preserveth the flocks and herds. This Evander therefore coming upon a time into Italy, and resting in these parts, consecrated both this grove and cave to Pan, and according to the manner of his countrey, there honoured him. In the said cave therefore reared was an altar, and a goat thereupon sacrificed unto him, as to the god and preserver of the flocks: and seeing that he chased wolves from them, therefore the place wherein he was worshipped took the name * Lupercal.

* Quasi lupo arces

Now the feast Lupercalia was by Romulus and Remus instituted. For they having obtained of Numitor a plot of ground to build them a City on, in that very place where they had beene cast forth, called all their companions to a feast and merry meetings: where, after they had killed sacrifices, and refreshed themselves with meat, and withall taken their wine liberally to the full, they grew to disport, and in the merry fit clad themselves in the skins of the goats which they had sacrificed, and then fell to hopping and dancing full jocundly. Hereupon their posterity, celebrating the memoriall thereof, held a festivall solemnity called Lupercalia, which retained the name of the place where first they began. Hereof see more in Valerius Maximus, Servius & Plutarch in the life of Antonius. As for the fig-tree Ruminalis, it was so named of the river Tyber, called at the Roman. Some would have it take the name of Romulus. Others of the milk given to the said infants, for that part of the throat which draweth milk is called Ruma in Latines. This place was over against the house of the two lords Cosmus and Damianus, on the side of the mount Palatine, opposit against the shew-place, called Circus Maximus. Romulus and Remus thus laid forth about Lupercal, and carried by the water to this place, were fostered for a while under the fig-tree Ruminalis, in the place where the Comitium after was. The tokens of this tree remaineth unto the time of Augustus Caesar, as Ovid testifieth.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the new way, the streets Jugarius and Tuscanus.

The street called the new way over against the temple of Jupiter Stator goeth along the valley between the Capitol hill and the Palatine, and reacheth to the Forum Romanum. This, howsoever it be called new, was well known to be most ancient, and is different from that, which Calpurnius repaired under his baits.

The street Jugarius, otherwise called Thurarius, leadeth from the gate Carmentalis, along the foot of the Capitol hill, to the Forum Romanum. In it was the altar of Juno Juges, who was thought to make marriages, and to couple folk in matrimonies, and she it was that gave the name to Vicus Jugarius.

Vicus Tuscanus beginneth at the Forum, and along the foot of the Palatine sheweth the way to Velabrum. The reason of the name was this. The Tuscans upon a time fighting against the Aricians, were by them overcome; and after many thousands of them slain in battel, the rest being few in number fled to Rome: who taking delight in the pleasant seat of the City, & the commodiousness of the place, determined there to remain. Whereupon having a plot of four stadia granted them by the Senat, between the Capitol and Palatine, they inhabited the same. Hereupon the street was called by them Tuscanus Vicus, & many a 100 year after retained that name. In it afterwards there kept bawds and such kind of people, wherupon it grew out of credit, and lost also the first name.

CHAP. XV.

The Arches of Romulus, the Senaculum, and the dwelling house of Ovid.

The old temple (which some think Romulus erected) continued a long time built of brick, neither would the Romans suffer that any man should make them of marble: to the end, that the memoriall of their City founder, should remain more firmly in the minds of men. But in continuance of time long after, they decayed and fell down, in that very place where now is the church of Saint Mary of Ovid, and were never afterwards rebuilt. The Romans named that place Senaculum, between the Capitol and the Forum, wherein the Senat kept a consistory for counsell and consultation.

That

That Ovid's mansion house stood under the Capitol, himself witnesseth, even where as now the church is of S. Mary of Consolation.

Thus much of the buildings of the Capitol and the valley to it. Now followeth the mount Palatine.

The third Book.

CAAP. I.

The divers etymologies of Palatine.

Albeit the hill Palatine were along time inhabited before the City was built, and namely, first by Valentia the daughter of Italus; then by Evander, who also therein set up a castle: whom there succeeded after the City was founded, KK. and Emperors; inasmuch as scarcely any one place of Rome is more renowned by writing, then this hill: yet the certain reason of the name why it should be so called, and which a man may be bold to follow, can hardly be set down. Some would have it so called, because the Arcadians wandering with Evander disorderly, and the Palatines out of the Rheatinus territory (called likewise Palatium) came to that mount and it inhabited: others of Palas the great grandfather of Evander. Livy thought, that of Palantium a City of Arcadia, it was first called Palantium, and afterward Palatine. There are besides, who of Palatia the wife of Latinus, fetch the original of the denomination: or of Palatibo, the daughter of Hyperboreus, who bare Latinus unto Hercules, and inhabited this mountain: or of Palantia the daughter of Evander, who there was buried: or of Palas, who was himself interred in it. Some there was also, of the bleating of the sheep, which pastured there in times past, before the hill was by men frequented and peopled, imagine it was so named: or else because flocks were wont there palare, that is, to wander and graze up and down. And hereupon it is, that Nevius called it Balanium, of Balatus; or Palantium of * palare. Tremellius calleth it the mount Romuleus, of Romulus his image, found at the very foot of the said hill. This may suffice of the derivation of the name,

* Beletus, i.e. Bleating.

CHAP. II.

The temple of Victory, Ceres, Juno Sospita, and the mother of the gods: the temple of Liberty and the porch they of, as also the house of Caius.

NOW that we have declared the reason of the name of Palatium; we will go forward to shew the temples and houses of the mountain, like as we have done in the description of the Capitol hill.

When the Romans had performed fortunately many martial exploits, and oftentimes returned with victorie over their enemies, because they would not be found unthankfull to the gods, unto whom they were beholden for their happy achievements, and thereby afterwards misse of the like fortunate successe; they consecrated unto the goddesse Victory a temple in that part of the Palatine, which looketh toward the hortyards and gardens of Maria Nova in the very bottom of the descent, hard at the gate Romana. L. Posthumius an Edile Curule took order for the building thereof, out of certain mony raised by fines and penalties; and when it is finished, he dedicated it to the goddesse Victoria.

Near thereto there was a chappel, consecrated to Viktoria, which M. Porcius Cato vowed.

Besides in the same place was the temple of Juno Sospita.

The Arcadians, which with Evander came to the Palatine hill, built a temple also in Palatium to Victory, but as different from this above-named, as far more ancient and to the honor of that goddesse, solemnized yearly sacrifices.

They built a temple also to Ceres in the Palatiae.

In the fatall book of Sibylla there was a prophesie found, That the forrein enemy and strange born should be chased out of Italy, in case the mother of the gods might be brought to Rome from Pessinus. Now a stone it was, which the inhabitants of that countrey so called. Sent therefore were Embass. into Asia as far as to Pessinus a town of Phrygia: who brought with them that Great mother of the gods in Italy. Then P. Cornelius carried it from the sea into the Palatine, and bestowed it into the temple of Victory, until such time as one was built of purpose for her. Afterwards, M. Livius and C. Claudius the Censors, took order for a temple to be made to this great mother of the gods, & the same set out with statues, pillars and pavement of divers stones of great price. And Junius Bruns dedicated it. The plaies also and games called Megalense, whereof Cicero speaketh, were first instituted at the dedication thereof.

Unto Liberty, P. Clodius built a temple and stately gallery, in part of Cassius his house, near the temple of Jupiter Stator.

CHAP. III.

CHAP. III.

*Of the Chappell and altar * Febris in the temple of Lare, the chappell of the goddess Viriplaca of Faith, and Jupiter Victor.*

* The fever.

Not to those gods only that did good to mankind the Romans consecrated temples, but dedicated chappels to those also that did them hurt; to the end, that they should do less harm, and punish them more gently. For certain it is, that on the hill Palatine there was a temple & altar both consecrated to the Fever, like unto Nemesis the goddess of vengeance, wherof before in the second book.

Besides, they erected a chappell of the Lares in the Palatine.

In like manner, there was a chappell in the Palatine, consecrated to the goddess * Viriplaca into which, if man and wife came together, although they disagreed and were talkt out before, they returned home again good friends from thence, and all was well.

* Not much unlike, but somewhat a better faint, then S. Vincen-bre of Paula.

After that Aeneas with his son Ascanius and daughter Roma came into Italy, they reared a temple to Faith, in Palatine: they which was dedicated not withstanding in the name of the daughter, and the same was written in the forefront of the temple: and therefore many years after, when Romulus and Remus strove who should give name to the City, the Senat and people of Rome reading the name of Aeneas his daughter in the frontispice of the said temple, resolved to name the City after her, Roma.

Q. Fabius in the Sabin war, vowed a temple to Jupiter conqueror: and afterwards built it on the Palatine hill, and there dedicated it.

CHAP. IIII.

The temples of Heliogabalus, Apollo and the Penates: the house of Orcus, the place of the Palladium or image of Minerva, and the temple of Augustus.

Antoninus Heliogabalus consecrated a god in the mount Palatine, which he called Heliogabalus, and built a temple in the place, where before stood that of Orcus or Pluto. But to win credit and name to this new and counterfeit god with great reverence and worship, he endeavoured to translate into this temple of his, * the sacred cup of that great mother of the gods, the fire of Vesta, the image of Minerva, called Palladium, the heavenly scutcheons, and all things else which the Rom. honoured above the rest. The Christian and Jewish religion also he there counterfeited, to the end, that no man in the religious worship of that temple and god, might alledge any pretence why he should not with good conscience so do.

* Scyphum, or rather typhum, the figure.

Moreover, in the Palatine, there was built a most ancient temple of Apollo. This chanced to be overthrown by thunder and lightning; and when the soothsayers gave out, that the god missed it & required another, Augustus Caesar adjoined a porch to the ruins thereof, and reedified the temple a new that there stood: wherein himself, when he grew aged, many a time sat in council with the Senat, and empanelled the decuries of judges. In it like wise were pendant candlesticks, branched with arms like trees, whereon the approved poets bestowed their writings. Certain marks and tokens of this temple are to be seen (although obscurely) neer to the vineyard of Edra, where the house of Tiberius stood. Unto him were instituted the Apollinare games, wherof read Cicero.

The temple of the City-protectors, called Penates, stood in that part of the Palatine which looketh into the North, even to Velia not far from the Forum. In it were the images of the Trojan gods: in the same are portrayed two young men sitting together and holding a ball in their hand. In like manner, the crooked augurs staves called Lurs, of iron and brass. Besides, an earthen Trojan vessel of potters work. Apollo also and Nephtis were there to be seen.

When the temple of Vesta was on a light burning fire, the image of Pallas being saved out thereof, was translated into Velia, and gave the name unto temple of Palara, now S. Andrews church, standing in the same place.

Some report, that there was a temple built in Palatium to Augustus Caesar of famous memory by his daughter Livia.

CHAP. V.

The Palatine houses, and the court of the Salii.

That Romulus and Remus being shepherds abode some time in these parts, the sheds and cottages, which long time after were found here, made of slight wood & reed, do testify: which as any of them in continuance of time decayed and fell down, the shepherds repaired with the like matter to their ancient form, that the perpetuall memorial of Romulus and Remus the City founders, what kind of persons they were, and what manner of houses they lived in, might be delivered to posterity. In that corner of the Palatine hill, which leadeth unto the grand cirque of sheew-place, there stood (many ages) the cottage which they called Casa Romuli.

Tullus Hostilius, before he built his court dwelt upon Velia, in that very place were afterwards the chappell of the Penates stood.

Not far from thence, even in that part of the Palatine, which regardeth the Forum, Cariline (by report) had his house built.

More.

Moreover, between M. Scaurus his house and Caecilius, there was but a small step over. Cicero's house purchased of Crassus, was in the most frequent and conspicuous place of the mount Palatine, above the Church of Jup. Stator, near the Palatium.

Pliny testifieth, how the houses of Crassus the Orator, and Phaedrus, in the Palatium, were in old time overturned.

One Captain Varus likewise had an house in the Palatium, whereof we have written in the former chapter.

Augustus (born in the region about Palatium, in a place called Caput bubulae, the ox heads; and where after his death, they erected a chapel unto him) dwelt first near the Roman Forum, above the round stairs called Scala annularia, in the house sometime of Calpurnius the Orator. Afterwards he built the stately Palatine at his own charges and gave it to the City, and himself dwelt on the Palatine hill in the small house of Hortensius.

The Guild, or religious court of the Salii, built in the mount Palatine, chanced to be burnt; and in the ashes thereof, the staff of Romulus called Ennius was found, without any hurt.

Publius dwelt in an house standing over the Forum, which was called Suburbia. That the dwelling house of Tarquinius Priscus was near unto the Temple of Jup. Stator, may soon be proved out of Livy.

CHAP. VI.

Of the top of Velia; the statues in Palatine, and other things in general.

The pitch of the hill called Summa Velia, was in that higher part of Palatium, which looketh into the South-east, whereas now is the Temple of Mary the new. Called Velia it was, because in old time before the device of shearing sheep, the shepherds were there wont to pluck the wooll from the sheeps back.

Augustus set up a Library of Latine and Greek books in Palatine, and adorned it with the money raised of the most excellent brasse of that huge colossus of Tuscan Apollo. He adjoynd thereto a porch or gallery, which they called Palatium.

In it was erected by the Senat, a statue unto Numerianus the Emperor, and a singular oratory. In the same porch, the Romans also set up a statue unto M. Varro, whilst he lived.

The Auguracium, which was a place where they used to take auguries, was upon mount Palatine. Apollon Palatinus likewise, the workmanship of Scopas, was in Palatium. Latona in the same was placed.

Thus the Emperor set up a golden statue in Palatine to Britannicus.

Moreover, the tree which grew out of Romulus his spear, was in the Palatium. For he, after he had taken his auguries in the mount Aventine, lanced his spear from him into the Palatine, which sticking in the earth, budded forth leaves and grew to be a tree.

Likewise the bay tree, which the same day that Augustus was born, sprung with him and suddenly appeared, was in Palatium. Of this laurel tree, they that afterwards triumphed, were wont to wear their wreathed garlands.

The Palatine baths, whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration for Roscius, were in the same Palatium; and of them there remain yet some tokens, above the Circus maximus, not far from the vineyard of Pedra.

In the same mountain also there was a place called Sicilia, and Impeters parlor.

The most beautiful streets called Antoniana, paved with Lacedaemonian and Porphyre stones, were in Palatium. The streets also of Padus, and Fortuna respiciens, were to be seen in Palatine. And there were the games and pastimes celebrated, which they call Palatinal.

CHAP. VII.

The Palatium now called the Greater: the court-yard of the Palatium; and the old gate of the very Palatium is self.

How great a compass the Palatium took up in old time, how gorgeously it was built, how rich, how frequent and full of houses, the huge ruins, the pictures, statues, and most precious pillars there found, do easily declare. For no man ever hath left in writing, who first built so great and stately edifices; who afterwards enlarged the same, and in so conspicuous a place erected those houses. By little & little it grew to so great an height; as if all writers should be ignorant of those antiquities: neither was any thing at one time done at once, which seemed worth the memorial. For Historiographers are wont to deliver unto posterity those things only which are rare and worthy of admiration. The mount Palatine at this day is called Palatium majus, and setting aside the Church of Saint Andrew, hath scarce two houses inhabited. The rest being either replenished with vines or fit for pasture, yeeldeth grass and food, for sheep, caples, and goats. So as it seemeth it may be called Balanium of the bleating that sheep make, rather than Palatium.

This Palatium had also a place therein called Arrium, built in old time and hallowed by Angur; in it the Senat sate in council, because they might not assemble in any place unaugurate or unhallowed. Therein also rams were sacrificed.

The old gate of the Palatium was near the Rostra, over-against S. Laurence Church in Miranda. Some would have this to be called the gate of Romulus, in old time.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

The Temples of Janus, Augustus, and Faustina.

After the description of the Temples and edifices of Palatium the third part of the city, now followeth a fourth: namely, the Roman Forum. Therein is the most stately Temple of Janus, (for me thinks we do well to begin at Janus, who is counted the dore and entrance as it were of all things) having four gares. For Janus himself, who was therein worshipped, had four faces: and from Falisci a city in Tuscany forced by the Romans, he was translated to Rome into the Forum, named after Transitorium. His Temple was built in that part of the said Forum which looked toward the Roman Forum. Procopius saith, that in his daies it was built in the mids of the Forum over-against the Capitol, a little above the place which the Romans called, The three Destinies. Other Temples there were besides of Janus, and namely, in the Capitol neer the theatre of Marcellus, with two fronts all of brass, and had two brasen dores, which in time of peace were shut: and against war, were set open.

The temple of Augustus was builded in the Roman Forum. This was begun in the time of Tiberius the Emperor, but left imperfect. Caligula finished it. Above it, he made a bridge which joyned the Capitol and Palatine together.

There remain yet to be seen certain monuments and marks of the temple of Faustina. Hadrianus the Emperor her husband founded it at the foot of the Palatine hill (where the brasen image of a bull standeth) for her sake that she might be honoured as a goddess. The same, his son Antoninus Heliogabalus afterwards would have to be a temple for himself, or Jupiter Syrius, or else the Sun. At this day it is the church of S. Laurence in Miranda.

CHAP. IX.

The Temple of Castor and Pollux, and the Rostra.

NO man doubteth but that the temple of Castor and Pollux was sometime in the Roman Forum before the Rostra, neer to that above said of Faustina. This sacred house A. Posthumius the Dictator dedicated: and L. Metellus afterwards repaired and beautified it, with the Dalmatian spoils. In it, as in many other, the Senat used to sit in council, and therein were publick Orations made to the people. C. Metellus adorned the same with statues, pillars, and excellent painting: wherein also he set up the portraiture and resemblance of Flora, a picture of singular beauty. A table besides, which contains the records and monuments, touching the free burgesse granted to the horsemen of Capua. The steps and greeces going up to this temple, Clodius afterwards plucked up, as witnesseth Cicero.

There was a temple or consecrate place called Rostra, at the foot of the hill Palatium, over-against that before-named of Castor and Pollux, whereas now is the little chappel of S. Mary de Inferno. From these Rostra, were the sentences and acts of the Senat, brought and propounded to the people.

CHAP. X.

The Temple of Caesar, Venus Genetrix, and Mars revenger: and the court of Venus.

Cesar of famous memory had a temple neer his own Forum, at the broad-street called Sacra, behind the temple of Faustina. In it were set up as Saints, Victory and Castor.

In the same Caesars Forum, there stood a chappel of Venus Genetrix, behind the said temple of Faustina. This, Caesar vowed in the Pharsalian war, and dedicated it. After victory in the war against Pompey, Caesar enclosed the temple of the said Venus, within a court-yard and a cloister, which Hadrian afterwards repaired and built new.

Augustus Caesar in the battel of Philippi, vowed a temple to Mars the avenger, which afterwards he edified in his own Forum, wherein were certain iron pots dedicated to Mars: and two statues, bearing up the tabernacle of Alexander the Great. This is thought to be at this day the church of Saint Martina.

CHAP. XI.

The Temples of Vulcan, Concord, Peace, Romulus, and Venus Cloacina.

The temple of Vulcan, Romulus founded, above the Comitium and Forum Romanum, at the bottom of the Palatine hill: but Tatius dedicated the temple of Vulcan, as also of the Sun and Moon, of Saturn, Rhea, Vesta, Diana, and Quirinus. In the temple of Vulcan there was dedicated unto Vulcan, the brasen chariot of Romulus, wherein he rode in triumph a second time. Therein remained also the statue of Cocles there erected. Many a time were Orations made to the people in this time.

In the yard belonging to Vulcan's temple, Publius, the son of a Libertine or enfranchised citizen, 303 years after the building of the capitol, vowed the temple of Concord, if he could reconcile the States of Senators and Gentlemen to the people. Afterwards he built it of the amercements and penalties that he took of usurers condemned, at the foot of the mount Palatine. Opimius the Consul afterwards repaired it anew. In it, Pliny testifieth that an altar ran blood for two daies. Livia Drusilla in her open gallery, erected a chappel of Concord, in regard of the mutual and loving agreement between her husband and her: which afterwards Fiberius dedicated.

Coburn

In that place where Drusilla first founded the said chappel of Concord, Vespasian afterwards with wonderful celerity and speed, (after the civil wars ended) finished the Temple of Peace, begun before by Claudian. A large building this was and four square, set out with most stately and fair columns, and of all other Temples the richest. In it Vespasian bettowed the holy vessels and precious ornaments of the Temple in Hierusalem, which T. had shewed in triumph. It had also the statue of Ganymedes, and an infinite number of other ornaments wherewith it was decked and beautified. This Temple caught a fire, and at once suddainly was consumed whole: and never was it known to this day how this fire came: unless it were (as some imagine) by reason of an earthquake which hapned the same hour, the stones rubbed together and struck fire.

An altar of Peace was by Augustus first reared: but in what place, the posterity knoweth not. The same, Agrippa afterwards enlarged and adorned. Between the Temple of Peace and Faustina, there is at this day a most ancient Temple, and two pillars of the porch to it, which now is dedicated to the two brethren Saint Cosmes and Damians. Some think it was the Temple of Romulus and Remus, the same that Carvilius the Consul, after he had subdued the Samnits, dedicated, and of the infinite mass of spoils adorned it.

That the Temple of Venus Cloacina stood neer the broad street Sacra, Ovid testifieth. Now the image of this Cloacina was found in a privy or draught, called Maxima, and Tatius consecrated it. And because it was not known whose resemblance it was, it took the name of the place wherein it was found.

CHAP. XII.

The Temples of Tellus, Salus, Victoria, the Sun and Moon, the house of Cassius, and the Armory.

Where the Temple of Tellus stood, some say it is uncertain: others think it was not far from the Esquilæ, neer the rising of the hill that leadeth to S. Peters Church in Vinculis, where as now standeth the Temple of Pantaleon. Sempronius vowed it: for whiles he fought a battail with his enemy, at Asculum the head Town of the Picentins, the earth quaked: and because he would pacify the goddess Tellus (i. the earth) which he thought was angry, he vowed this Temple unto her. Built it was in the same plot of void ground, where the house of Spurius Cassius (who sought to be a King) was overthrowen. Neer unto this Temple of Tellus, there was an Armory: where of Cicero also maketh mention in a certain place. Within the said compass, C. Junius Bibaculus the Consul, vowed a chappel to the goddess Salus, in the time of the Samnits war. The same was by him put forth to building when he was Censor, and dedicated by him Dictator.

L. Velumninus an Edile, caused the Temple of Victoria neer the Roman Forum to be made, of the penalties and fines taken.

In this place also was the altar of Apollo.

Some would have, that the Temples of Concord and Æsculapius, were neer the Amphitheatre, in the place where the gardens be of S. Mary the new.

The Temple of Mercury also was in the Forum.

The Temples likewise of Isis and Serapis were in the Burse called Emporium. And some think, that these were the Chappels of the Sun and Moon, dedicated by Tatius.

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum of Trajanus: the things now therein, or that have been heretofore.

Thus much of Temples, of holy and religious places, which seemed worth the noting, hath been briefly written. Now from hence forward we will speak of those things, which shall concern the honour and memorial of mortal men, and first begin we will with that excellent Prince Trajanus.

Forum Trajani was built (with wonderful Art and industry of man) by Apollodorus, between the Forum of Nerva, the Capitol hill, and the mount Quirinal. The same workman built also (at the commandment of Trajanus) Metodeum and Gymnasium. The roof of that Forum or Hall was of brass, within round about in every place the forms and images of horses, and military ensigns all guile. Now were these foresaid images erected there at the cities charges in memorial of them that had deserved well of the common-weal, or otherwise of some notable act.

The triumphant arch in like manner with many other monuments reared to the praise of Trajanus, adorned this Forum or hall of his.

The porch of this Forum, built upon most mighty and high pillars, and resting upon large chapirs, yielded so great admiration to the beholders, that they seemed rather the works of giants than men. Into this, Alexander Severus in the honor of Trajanus, translated most beautiful statues of singular men.

Trajan's horse in like manner stood in the midst, bearing upon high columns.

In a coin also there is found the image of Trajan, with this inscription: S. P. Q. R. Optimo Prin- Principis. The Senat and the people of Rome to the best Prince. But hereof Lampridius writeth much.

He likewise is reported to have adorned the palace, made of sundry marbles, with pictures and statues within.

In the midst of the Forum, there stood the column of Trajan, built with winding stairs. This had round about it the summary of the acts of Trajan engraven and chased most cunningly; but above all the Dakes war: within there be 185 steps up to the top; and it hath 40 little windows to let in light unto them that shall go up: 120 foot high it was, or (as Eutropius writeth) 140. In the lower or lantern thereof were the bones of Trajan kept within a golden ball. This pillar, Trajan himself never saw: for while he warred against the Parthians, the Senat dedicated it unto him in his absence. But he in his return from the Persians, died in the way at Seleucia, a City in Syria, of a flux of blood. His dead corps was brought to Rome: and of all the Emperors, he alone (as Eutropius writeth) was interred within the City. The reason why his bones are left in that Column is this: The manner in old time was, for Princes and Noblemen to be buried under hills: but there being not mountains enough whereupon to raise sepulchres in every place, it hapned that such steeples and high pillars were set over their dead bodies instead thereof.

CHAP. XIV.

The Forum, the Palace, and porch of Nerva.

NEXT to our sight cometh the Forum of Nerva, and it is behind the Church of S. Hadrian. In the midst of it there stood a Column of brasse of an huge bigness; covered with plate of latten or copper, and hath within it light every way. This Forum was garnished with divers statues and Columns, containing the whole order of the acts of Nerva. This was afterwards called Forum Transitorium, for that from it there was the way to the Forum of Augustus, and the Roman.

There appeareth as yet some part of the Porch or gallery belonging to the Forum: for being consumed by fire, yet it left certain obscure tokens, witnessing, that in the same place was the Forum of Nerva.

Part also of the Palace of Nerva, built of square stones and pillars, together with the Church of S. Blase, are yet seen enclosed between the Comitium and the tower of Militia.

CHAP. XV.

The Roman Forum, the Comitium, the prison Tullianum, and the Image of Marforius.

THE Roman Forum, which also is called Latinum, began at the foot of the Capitoll, and reached in length to the Church now of S. Mary the new, which is in Velia. But at the first, the circuit and bounds thereof were much narrower. For from the head thereof abovenamed, it went no farther than the nearest foot of the mount Palatine. Many a year after, Augustus Caesar enlarged it.

The Comitium joyned to the Forum, or rather it was a part thereof: for it beginneth at the gate of Palatium, and endeth at the Church of S. Mary the new.

At the foot of the Capitoll hill, South-east ward, Ancus Martius built a prison for malefactors to be laid up in. After him K. Tullius adjoyned to it that part which is under the ground, and called that dungeon, Tullianum. Made it was of huge and mighty big stones, with narrow long holes, for to receive the shadow, as it were, and resemblance of a light. The dungeon within was vaulted with stone, ugly for darkness, and loathsome by reason of a strong and stinking sent. This whole prison was divided into two parts, the upper room and the nether. Carcer it was called in Latine, because it kept them there enclosed from coming forth.

Just before this prison there lieth a huge marble idoll which they call Marforius. Some think it was the Image of the bakers god, others, of Jupiter, surnamed Panarius, of the rumours that beat out like to loaves of bread. For the Romans in times past, when they were besieged by the Gauls in the Capitoll, had warning by Jupiter in a dream, to make bread of all the corn that they had left, and to throw it into the enemies camp: Whereby the Gauls despairing that the Romans could possibly be tamed with hunger, brake up the siege. Wherenpon the Romans in perpetuall memoriall of this benefit, created an altar and a statue to Jupiter Pistor.

This image is thought to be the resemblance of the river Rhenus in Germany, because it is upon a rock. But why it should be called Marforius, I know not, unless it be because it standeth in the Forum of Augustus.

CHAP. XVI.

The Secretary of the people of Rome; the arch of Septimius; the Temple of Saturn, Of the Treasury, and the mint-house where they coined money.

BEFORE the Image of Marforius over against the arch of Septimius is the Church of S. Martina: where, as it appeareth by an evidence engraven in marble, was sometime the place called the Secretary of the people of Rome. Right against the said Church of S. Martina at the bottom of the rock Tarpaeus, standeth the arch of Septimius, which in both the fronts thereof containeth the deeds of that Emperor both by land and sea.

Directly there followeth the Temple, sometimes of Saturn, now, S. Hadrian's Church. The said Temple was of great antiquity. Some report L. Larginus for the builder thereof; others L. Tarquinus: albeit more likely it is that Larginus dedicated it. Esay writeth that when A. Sempronius and M. Minutius were Coss. Numantius Plancus reedified it. The treasury of the people of Rome, no writer denieth, but that it was translated out of the Capitol into this Temple. But why men in old time would have the treasure to be within Saturn's Temple, there be divers opinions. Some say, because in Saturn's daies there was no theft committed: for under him all things were common; no covetous miser nor lewd person laid wait for his neighbour; but all things were administered with righteousness, faith, and love. Cyprian alledgeth this cause, because Saturn was the first that in Italy ordained money to be coined. Moreover, in this treasure-house were kept the publike ordinances. Also the books called Elephantini, containing the five and thirty tribes of the people of Rome. Moreover, all the books of the Cities accounts: also the ancient writings and records of the old Aerarium and the City debts. Furthermore, the standards and ensigns of war. Over and besides, whatsoever was by the Generals and Captains after the conquest of Provinces carried in triumph, was thither brought. Lastly, whatsoever was expedient and profitable for the Common-weal to be reserved, as laws, letters, and other common registers of a City. The Censors likewise were put to take their oath in the Temple of Saturn.

Between the Church now of S. Hadrian, and that which sometime was the Temple of Castor and Pollux, stood in old time the work-house wherein they coined money.

CHAP. VII.

The golden Miliarium the bridge of Caligula the Rostra and the Curia

Miliarium aureum stood in times past at the head of the Roman Forum, under the Temple of Saturn, near to the arch of Septimius. A pillar it was, so called, wherein all the high-ways of Italy were cut and engraven, and there ended, and from which the measures began and went on to every gate of all quarters.

Caligula brought a bridge of marble through the Roman Forum, from the mount Palatine to the Capitol. A more stately and curious piece of work there never was throughout all the City: for the bridge was sustained with fourscore mighty pillars of most white marble: whereof at this day three are to be seen at the foot of the one hill, and as many at the other, in such manner as they were in times past by Caligula built for the bridge. In the midst of the Forum, over-against S. Hadrian's Church there standeth a pillar, which is verily thought to be one of them that supported the brazen horse of Domitian gilded all over. At the foot of this horse was the resemblance of Rhene, a river in Germany: for that Domitian the Emperor had triumphed over that Province. And this is the Image which afterwards they called Marforius.

Of the beakheads of the Anat ships, a pulpit was built in the Roman Forum by the Romans at the foot of the mount Palatine, which Temple they called Rostra, that therein the acts of the Senat should be made. Now of this Rostra there were twain, the new at the bottom of the Palatine as is before said, and the old, near the Curia in the Comitium. In this Rostra were laws published, causes pleaded, and Orations made to the people. On the same the manner was also to erect the Statues for most famous and noble men.

In the most conspicuous place of the Forum Romanum, before Rostra, upon a lion of stone was the portraiture set for Faustulus the fosterfather of Romulus and Remus. For he, while he was desirous to part the fray between Romulus & Remus the founders of the City, was there slain, where, afterwards they erected unto him his statue. Behind the Rostra was the sepulchre also of Romulus. Moreover, before the Rostra stood the statue of Heracles, clad in a coat after the Eleans habit, with a grim and stern countenance. Three statues also of Sibylla in the same place. The manner of the Romans besides, was to set up the heads of those that were put to death, there to be seen.

Two Curia or Council-houses at Rome there were: one near the Forum, fast by the Temple of Peace, named Hofilia; the other in the mount Capit, whereof we will speak hereafter.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Lake Curtius, the great sink or town ditch, and the Dolosa.

The lake Curtius was in the midst of the Rom. Forum, near Domitian's horse. This lake took that name of M. Curtius, who to save the Common-weal, willingly of his own accord cast himself headlong, armed as he was, together with his horse into a chink of the ground in the midst of the Roman Forum. Some would have it so called of Metius a Sabine, who through this lake escaped safe to his own company.

The vault or sink called Cloaca Maxima, was made by the commandment of Tarquin: for by reason that the hills were digged under, and the City stood hollow upon arches, it received & carried away all the filth thereof. At the Temple of Jup. Stator, divided it was into three conveyances or channels, whereof two of them are now stopped up, the third runneth with most clear water by the Lake Curtius, under the Roman Forum, along the foot of the mount Palatine into Tiber, and from thence in a sink made of four-square stone, it dischargeth it self into Tiber. In old time there there were many such vaults, and those for publike use. But after the City was won by the Gauls & burnt, while every man made haste to rebuild his house, where he could meet first with a convenient place: they took no heed to the streets as they were before: so as neither the City was divided as aforetime into quarters, nor yet the finks which in times past went under the streets, were marked where they lay: but afterwards were conveyed under privat mens houses, whereby it came to pass, that each house almost at this day hath a sink or privy belonging to it. Hereupon also it is, that this author, whose epitome or abridgment we write, hath not divided the regions of the City, agreeable to the old writers, But to the end that those things which he setteth down, might be sooner understood, and better remembered, he hath parted it into those quarters as now it standeth and when he sheweth in what part of the city any place in times past was, he declareth them in those parts which at this day are known to the Inhabitants. But as at first these finks were common (as I have said) so there were appointed publike overseers to look unto them.

Near the foresaid great sink there was a place, which of certain barrels under the ground was called Dalioia. This place was reputed so holy, that a man might not spit thereupon. In it were supposed to have been certain secret mysteries of Numa. And yet, there be that think verily the ashes of the French Senones were there bestowed.

CHAP. XIX.

The Comitium, the Temple of Venus Genitrix. The Statues and Images that were in the Comitium, and Roman Forum, Cæsars statue and pillar,

WHere the Comitium was, from what place it began, and in what part of the City it ended, we have shewed before, in the fiftenth chapter of this book. Called it was Comitium, as Plutarch saith, for that Romulus and Tatius were wont to meet together in this place, to make covenants between them. In which place afterwards, the Senat and people of Rome assembled, when they would decree any thing for the good of the C. W. and namely, when Consuls, Tribunes Consular, and such Magistrats were created, and other affairs concluded, whereof authors make mention in all their writings. That place was near the Senaculum, at the very foot of the mount Palatine. This Comitium was open above-head for many years: whereupon oftentimes, albeit assemblies were summoned, yet they were impeached holding for them, fearing some tempestuous weather toward. Long time after, when Annibal came into Italy, they set a roof over it: and afterwards Cæsar repaired it again. In this comitium the plaies were many times exhibited. In the same (as Livy reporteth) the books of Sibylla were burnt. In like manner many lewd and outrageous acts were committed in the assemblies there, whereof elsewhere we will speak.

In the Comitium stood the statue of Cæcus; which being afterwards stricken with fire from heaven, was translated into the court-yard of Vulcan. In the cantons and angles of the comitium, were the statues likewise of Pythagoras and Alcibiades: Also in the ascent and stairs thereof, on the left hand of the curia stood the Image of Accius, together with his whetstone and razor.

The image resembling the Mother goddess, was set up in the Forum. They that worshipped this goddess were of this opinion, that the stone whereof she was made, could not possibly be consumed with fire: which they guessed hereby, for that albeit many fires were made, in the night especially at her Image, yet it took no hurt thereby: and therefore gave they out, that there was such vertue herein, as I have said. And from thence it came, that in all streets almost they began to worship her, and to erect altars and little chappels unto her.

The Temple of Venus Genitrix, as is shewed before, was in the Forum: Just before this Temple stood the statue of Cæsar, carrying a blazing star upon the head. In like maner a Column of Cæsar made of Numidian marble 20 foot high there remained. Before the Temple of Cæsar there was the statue of Q. Martius in horsemans habit: of Tremellius clad in a side gown: of M. Atticus covered with a vail.

CHAP. XX.

The column called Mœnia: the pillar Horatia: the houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian, The Temple and Court-yard of the said Cæsar.

IN that part of the Forum was the Column Mœnia, where stood the palace of Portius. Called Mœnia it was, of Manius the Censor: for he (when as he sold unto Cæsar his house, and when Placens the other Censor gave order, that the palace aforesaid should there be built, reserved in the sale so much space for himself, as pillar or column would take up: upon the which he might put out aloft to jut forth, made of joists and boards upon them: from which place both he and his posterity might behold the sport of sword-fencers. And this privilege he obtained: whereupon, others also, as many as might be allowed, were as industrious, and built them columns in the Forum.

There stood a rock of stone in the Forum, whereupon the spoils of the three twins Curatius were hanged.

In like manner the pillar callar Horatia. The houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian beautified the Forum. Likewise the court and cloister of Minerva; and the shops [of Bankers] as well old as new.

The dead corps of Caesar was brought out of the Curia into the Forum, and interred in that place, where afterwards they built unto him an altar and Temple.

Likewise in the Forum the manner of the Romans was, to lay down their Magistracy,

CHAP. XXI.

Cæsars Forum: the Palace of Paulus, and his Library.

BESIDES the Temple of Saturn, or the common treasury (whereof we have written before in the 16 chap. of this book) in the Roman Forum toward the Northeast was Cæsars Forum, even in that very place which seemeth lower than the rest, behind the Temple of Faustina. There, was the Temple of Venus Genetrix, about which, Caesar made a cloister and a Forum, not of wares and merchandise to be sold, but for them that repaired thither for justice in law matters. In this Forum, among other statues (whereof there were many and those most fair and beautiful) he suffered his own to be made, all armed. The Forum it self contained but a small compass, but it was most excellently set out. The very level of the plot stood him in an hundred millions of Asses and above.

Caesar purchased with 1500 talents, Paulus Emilius the Collegue of C. Marcellus in his Consulship, to be his friend and to stand with him, Paulus having received this sum of money, built in the midst of the Forum near to the Temple of Castor and Pollux, a most excellent and wonderful Palace, of Phrygian columns, which afterwards they named, Basilici Pauli.

A Library also the same Paulus erected, near unto his own Basilica.

CHAP. XXII.

The Forum of Augustus: the galleries of Antonius, Faustina, and Livia: Cæsars house.

THE Roman Forum, those also of [Julius] Caesar and Augustus, were (as it is well known) near one to another. That of Augustus, they affirm to have been at the image of Marforius, in the most frequented place of the City: it was but in little compass, as the other of Cæsars, but excellently well adorned with brave statues and other things. For it had the statues of Castor and Pollux, with the victory of Alexander the Great: the image also of Corvinus, and of the raven that upon his helmet fought. Also Apollo in Ivory; and besides these, other ensigs and ornaments of vertue and valour.

In this Hall or Forum, publike justice was administred: and the judges from thence were empanelled: herein they debated in councill, of wars, of triumphs, and other weighty affairs. From hence they used to go when they took journey into their Provinces with sovereign command. Hither, they that returned victors, brought the ensigs and tokens of their victory. This Forum being by time decayed, Hadrian reedified.

This Forum had two porches, wherein were the statues set out & decked in triumphant manner.

Augustus dwelt in the street Sacra, in a house not so large and stately, but marvellously furnished by his neece Livia. And Augustus not able to abide this wastful superfluity of riches, pulled it down and laid it even with the ground: in the void place and court-yard whereof, was afterwards build the gallery of Livia; which also was called Claudia. Nero cast it down, but Domitian built it up again under the old name.

The goodly galleries of Antonine & Faustina, adorned with divers and sundry marbles well built in old time, were whereas at this day standeth the Church of S. Lawrence in Miranda.

CHAP. XXIII.

The raster or beam, called Sororium Tigillum: the street Cyprius, Sceleratus, and Patritius: the house of M. Antonius.

Sororium Tigillum was a place hallowed for the expiation and assoiling of Horatius for killing his sister, set up near the street Carina, to the honour of Jupiter.

The street Cyprius is near to the clift or rising of the Capitoll, which leadeth to the Church of S. Peter in Vinculis, so called of Cyprus. In it dwelt the Sabins first, when they were enfranchised and made free denizons. Surnamed afterwards it was Sceleratus, upon the wicked and devillish act of Tullia, whereof Livy speaketh. Some think this was one with the former: others say, it was divers from it.

The street Patritius was so called, because of Patritii, who were by K. Tullus commanded there to dwell. For this was a place raised somewhat higher than others; from whence as from the upper ground, they might easily defend themselves against the sudden violence of others, if it should be offered.

M. Antonius dwelt in that house, where sometimes stood the Temple of Tellus. After Antonius, the Church of S. Pantalon was in the same place built.

CHAP. XXIV.

Busta Gallica, and Equimelium.

Busta Gallica, was a place in the heart of the City, where the dead bodies of the Frenchmen that held Rome, were burnt and buried. It was in that part of the City where at this day standeth the the Church of S. Andrea (in Bassa Gallia) Now they call it by an awk name, Portugallo: and it is not far from the Amphitheatre; Vatro setteth the Bassa Gallia near the Aequimelinus. As for Aequimelinus, it was so called, because the house of Adrianus who fought to be K. was there laid level with the ground.

CHAP. XXV.

The street called Via Sacra & the arch Fabian and Vespasian.

THis street beginneth at the old Curia in the angle of Palatium near the arch of [Great] Con- stantinus. Vatro supposeth that it began at the Curia and the chappel of Sterna. Whereby a man may gather that the Via sacra sometimes went through the gardens now of S. Mary the new, to the Temple of Peace, the Forum of Caesar, and so directly up to the Castle of the Capitol. The name of Sterna it took, for that the Augurs when they came from the Capitol hill, went through it as they took their Augury for because monthly, they went in procession with sacred reliques along that way for lust of all, in regard that in it there was a league and covenant made between Romu- lus and Tatius. At the head and top of it, Aeneas Martius in times past dwelt, near the chappel of the Lares.

In this street was the famous statue set up of Clodia.

The arch Fabian likewise, near the Kings Palace, fast by the Basilica of Paulus, was reared by Fabius the Centurion, who subdued the Allobroges. In which arch was the scutcheon with his arms, and other tokens of the victory engraven. Fast by it, Scribonius Libo erected a seat and Tribunal for the Prætor, named Pænet.

In the same street-way was the marble arch of Vespasian, (the ancientest of all others that are now to be seen) erected by Vespasian after he had won Hiernsalem. In it were his victories cut and engraven, with the ark of the covenant of one side, and on the the other, his triumphs and spoils: and namely, the golden candlestick, the seven other lights, the two tables of Moses, the vessels of the Temple of Hiernsalem; the golden table, weighing one great talent; and many things else, whereof Josephus writeth.

CHAP. XXVI.

Græcofasia; Senaculum; the Curia; the Palaces of Optimius and Porcius.

Graeco-fasia is a place on the right hand of the Rostra, as men go forth of the Comitium; where, the Embassadors of foreign nations being sent unto the Senat, used to stand and give attendances until they were admitted to audience.

The Palace of Optimius, and the Curia, stood near unto the Græcofasia. Above the Græcofasia was the Senaculum at the Temple of Concord. Called it was Senaculum, because the Senat or the elders were wont there to meet. In Greek it is named ῥήγιστρον.

Curia was in the Comitium, and some think it is all one with Senaculum; so called, because the affairs that required publike care were there debated. There was a Curia also of Priests, where Church affairs were handled and treated of. Now this Curia where the Senat met, was a Temple or hallowed place: for neither might the Senat meet, nor act of Senat pass, but in the place set out and appointed by augury. Hereupon Curia Hostilia, Pompeia, and Julia, being profane places before, were by inauguration consecrated Temples. In this Curia was the altar of Victory: and upon the stairs of the said Curia stood the image of Victory, made of fine pure gold.

Cato the elder in the time of his Centorship, built (with the City money) a palace near to the Forum, under the Curia, which after his own name he called Porcia Basilica.

The palace also of Romulus (as men think) stood where the Church is now of S. Mary the new.
These places therefore which have been thus described in the fourth region of the City, joynd together in one place in manner, and were all contained within this circuit, as you go from the Comitium toward the Temple of Peace, and the Church and gardens of S. Mary the new almost as far as the Esquilia.

The fourth Book.

CHAP. I.

The Temple of Janus and Pietas: of the publike goal of Rom, Commons.

Some of the four parts of the City are described, the fifth ensueth; which includeth those places that comprehend Tyber, part of the Aventine on the right hand, and the rock Tar- peia on the left: and valley also which lyeth between those very hills. Wherefore begin we to describe this memorable place, which is next after the Theatre of Marcellus, and so run through the plain and leuell plot of the City. And with Janus first, whom men in old time believed to be the very door, and as it were the entrance of all things. Unto Janus Numa built a Temple at the gate Carnementalis, (afterwards the chappel of S. Katharine) at the bottom of the Argiletum, close unto the theatre of Marcellus. This Temple had two doors: in time of peace they were shut; but in war opened by that Consul, who, as the worthier person, was first created. It is found in records, that this Temple was shut but only thrice. First, by Numa, himself; secondly, by T. Manlius the Cos., and a third time by Augustus, after the battel of Actium. But why in time of war it stood open many reasons are given: and this is thought the chiefest, namely, an accident that befell when Romulus warred against the Sabines: for when the Sabines were now possessed of the gate Carmentalis, and about to rush violently into the City, all on a sudden unlooked for there issued forth upon the enemies a plenteous river and stream of hot scalding water out of the Temple of Janus, which stood near to the gate: whereupon they were driven to flee, and so the City was saved. From hence it is that posterity coming after, open the doors for Janus, that he might be at liberty, when he is called forth, as it were, to help in time of war.

Others report, that Tatius and Romulus both were the founders of that Temple: as who, when the covenant was made betwixt them, agreed together of that two-faced god as an indifferent and common witness to them both of the accord contracted between two Kings and two nations; and so erected unto him this Temple in that very place where now the ruins of S. Katharines Church are to be seen.

Moreover there be who affirm, that Cn. Duilius vowed it, and Tiberius built it: but the variety of these opinions seemeth hereupon to arise; for that it is received and held for certain, that there were many Jani worshipped as gods by the posterity; whereas they in old time believed but one: so as that which is spoken of divers, is falsely supposed, as said of one. Which may be seen before, whereas we wrote of Janus with four fronts or faces, whose Temple was erected in the Forum. For it is said, that Janus was the first who erected Temples and ordained divine service and ceremonies for the gods; and therefore in sacrifices deserved the first place.

Pourtraied he is with a key and a wand: as who is the porter to keep the gates, and the guide to direct the waies.

Augustus besides, brought his image out of Egypt to Rome, and in the herb-market built a Temple in the honour of him.

To Pietas in the said herb-market, M. Atilius Glabrio dedicated a Temple in that very place where at this day standeth the Church of S. Nicholas in the prison: for even there Ap. Claudius the Decemvir by a decree of the Senat built a prison, for that the common goal (whereof we have written before) was not sufficient; and called it, The prison for the Commons of Rome: wherein himself afterwards being found guilty wrought his own death. In which also many years after, a certain silly poor woman of base and obscure parentage being newly brought a bed being apprehended for an heinous offence, was condemned to be starved to death. Her daughter, being a milch woman and delivered lately of a child, made humble request to the goaler, that she might have leave to go to her mother: and when he had made straight search before, whether she brought with her any food: and saw her have nothing about her, let her in: and so she went and came many times. At the last known it was that the prisoner within was nourished by the breast-milk of her daughter: whereupon the mother was delivered and set free; and both mother and daughter were allowed their food ever after by vertue of a decree, at the Cities charges; and in regard of that kindness and affection of the child to the mother, they consecrated this place to the goddess Pietas. Livy supposeth, that it was not the mother but the father that in this manner was by the daughter nourished.

CHAP. II.

The herb-market: the Temple of Juno Matrca, and of Hope: the Oratory or Chappell of Numa: the Column called Lactaria: the Altar and Chappell of Carmenta.

His place hath the name of Forum Holitorium, for that therein is great store of worts and pot-herbs without the gate Carmentalis, where, where, in times past was the old market kept: and at this day called it is the street Montanaria.

Within the compass or the said market-place, C. Cornelius the Consul, in the time of the Gauls war, vowed a Temple to Juno Matrca: which afterward being Censor, he put out to building, in that very place where afterwards stood the Church of S. Andrew, surnamed in Memuzia.

The same C. Cornelius built in the Forum Holitorium the Temple of Hope, and the same adorned with divers and sundry marbles: which afterwards Collatinus consecrated. Many a day after, it was smitten with lightning; and in the end set on fire and burnt.

A Column also there was in the same market-place, named Lactaria: unto which the sucking babes that were to be nourished with milk, were presented.

The Oratory of Numa stood in the bottom of Argiletum, near the theater of Marcellus.

The Altar Carmentalis, consecrated by Evander to his mother Carmenta, stood before the gate Carmentalis.

In the same place also was the Chappell of Carmenta built by the matrons of Rome. At the first, she was called Nicostrata: but for that she delivered Oracles in verse, she took the name of Carmenta.

CHAP. III. The fish-market, and Temple of Fortuna Virilis.

The fish-market standeth along the Tybre, near to the [Forum] Junium, between the Churches of S. Mary in Portu and Egyptiaca, within the gate Carmentalis, not far from the Forum Boarium, i.e. the ox-market.

The Church of S. Mary Egyptiaca is at this day near the Tybre, and a bridge of the said name. Some go about to affirm and prove, that this was sometime the Temple of Adey; others, of Fortune and Chastity; but all in vain: for those Temples were not in this place, but in the ox-market, as for this Temple of Fortuna Virilis, whereof we now speak, it was near Tybre. In it stood the statue of Serg. Tullius made of wood and gilt all over, which in a great scare-fire when all things else were burnt, remained only safe and sound.

CHAP. IIII. The Temple of Vesta, the Saline, and the arch of Cocles.

Near the Church of Mary surnamed Egyptiaca, there remaineth at this day a most ancient Temple, now dedicated to S. Stephen, the frame whereof is circular, and the pillars are set round about and bear up the roof, which being one entire piece of work, carrieth the whole Temple. Consecrated it was in old times to Vesta, and Numataking that circular platform, from the Temple which was at Alba, made it with a lover in the top, having a hole to give light.

Howbeit, of this goddess her self there is no image nor resemblance; for that fire, whereof she is the goddess, can have no certain and permanent form. As for Vesta, the Latines call her so, because she is arraid with divers and sundry things. Of the Greeks she is named Isia, for that her force and power appertaineth to altars and hearths where fire is kept. This is not the Temple wherein the sacred fire is preserved: but that whereof we spake before, which Romulus built between the Capitol and Palatium.

Saline were the store-houses of the salt which served the City: and they stood upon that bankside of Tybre, which from the foresaid Temple of Vesta reacheth into the Aventine.

The arch of Horatius Cocles stood at the very foot of the Aventine hill, where the rising thereof beginneth between the mount and the Tybre.

CHAP. V. The Forum Boarium.

hitherto from the beginning of this fourth book, are described those things which on the right hand of the Tybre were worth the noting. Now forward we will after our manner, run through all the memorable things which are on the left side of that river: and first, as concerning the beast-market.

The beast-market was near to Velabrum and Janus, between the mount Palatine and the Greek school, close to the Temple, now called S. Gregories Church. In it there was a most ancient image in bras of a bull, whereupon some think it took the name Boarium. Others, for that oxen were there sold: or because they used in old time to sacrifice those kind of beasts there: or else, for that Evander in that place killed an ox in sacrifice to Hercules, for killing Cacus and recovering again his kine and oxen. In the same place were kept the instruments wherewith the Ministers belonging to sacrifices, the sacrificers also themselves, were furnished when they went about their sacrifice. In this market-place was the first fight exhibited of sword-fencers.

CHAP. VI. The Temple of Hercules Victor, and the Altar called Maxima.

The round Temple of Jupiter Victor was built in the beast-market, near the Greek school: where sometime Evander reared unto Hercules the altar called Maxima. This Temple (as they say) was so religious and venerable, that neither flie nor dog would enter into it. For Hercules at what time as he distributed a dole of flesh to his followers and ministers in his sacrifice, prayed unto Myiagrus, [the god that gathereth flies.] He it is therefore that driveth away all flies from this Temple: and at the door thereof he left his club behind, which as soon as the dogs see they run away far off: and thus unto the daies wherein Pliny lived it was free from flies and dogs. At the sacrifice and dining service of this Hercules, neither women nor bondslaves, nor yet freed men that had been in villenage might be present. At the last, this Temple was consumed in that fire which Nero the Emperour made.

Over and besides, Evander erected unto Hercules a statue, which was called, Hercules Triumphant, because so often as there was any triumph in the City it was clad with a mantle, and other habiliments of triumph.

All the time that Evander reigned Hercules had no more but an altar which they called Maxima: and this Evander reared unto him for killing of Cacus, and restoring his kine and oxen again.

Upon

Upon this altar he sacrificed the tenth part of the fruit of his kine: for Hercules had given out and promised, That they should live an happy life who dedicated unto him the tenth part of their goods. Hereupon cometh the name of Decima Herculeana, i.e. Hercules Tithes.

CHAP. VII

The Temples of Chastity, Prosperous Fortune, Matuta, and Fors fortuna: of the place called Vicus Publicus, Velabrum: and the sepulchre also of Acca Larentia.

Near to the Temple of Hercules, well known it is that a chappell was built by Amphitrion the Pudicitia Parricida, i.e. Gentlewomens chastity. Now the image that represented this Saint stood in the beast-market. To the service and sacrifices celebrated unto this goddess, virgins that were Commoners daughters might not come. And therefore a certain maiden of commoners daughters red a chappell also to Pudicitia Plebeia. From the service and sacrifices thereof, the Patrician virgins were likewise debarred. Many other places & Temples besides were consecrated to Pudicitia.

The Temples of Prosperous Fortune and of Matuta, Servius Tullius consecrated in the beast-market: And that Fortune he called Proserpa, which was not blind. In this place (say they) an Olive tree sometimes stood, and upon a time when honey dropped and flowed from it, the Soothsayers gave order, that a little coffer or box should be made of the wood thereof, wherein those lots were put and laid up, which by the direction of Fortune were either handled or shuffled together by the hands of young boys: as if such should prove happy, fortunate, & excellent. Servius Tullius married all his wife whatsoever to Fortune, who being born of a good woman, had many times found good by her, and was in the end advanced to princely dignity. And hereupon he dedicated Temples to Fortuna Primigenia, Matula, Concordens, Benivolens, and Vidua, as who would say, she ruled and did all. Likewise, a Temple he consecrated to little Fortuna, signifying thereby, that nothing can happen unto us, be it never so small, but we must attribute it, as coming from the gods.

A Temple to Matuta Camilla vowed in the Veiebian war and dedicated it: which long before that time Servius Tullius had erected. To Matuta and Fortuna Primigenia the Romans did sacrifice upon one and the self-same day: and likewise in one and the same day both their chappels were burned and consumed with fire together. Cicero the Consul caused a Temple to be made unto Fors Fortuna, call'd Fortis Fortuna, next unto that of Minerva, of the money raised out of the spoil gotten from the Tuscan.

The street called Vicus Publicus began at the Forum Trajanum, and went from thence into the Aventine, as far as to the Temple of Juno. In this street near the said Forum was the Chappell of Velabrum, in that very place where now standeth the Church of Saint Gregory in Velabrum, so called.

Aventine hill was sometime separated from the other mountains by the Tyber between: for before that Tanquinius Priscus turned the chappell of Tyber, it brake out many times, and having found a frith or creek, it beat upon the foot of the Aventine. And therefore of necessity, who ever would go to the Aventine was to make a fare, that is to say, by paying his quadrant, ferry over thither in a Wherry. Hereupon that place is at this day called Velabrum, a vehundus, i.e. carrying over, where sometimes the Tyber had wrought out a frith.

Aulus hath left in writing, that the sepulchre of Acca Larentia was in Velabrum.

CHAP. VIII

Vertumnus and his Temple: Janus with four faces: the house of Africanus: the Court or Palace Sempronius, and the wood-shops.

MEN in old time called Vertumnus, not only the god of buying, selling, and of fruits, but also him that ruled mens minds, so named Vertendo, for that oftentimes he turned & changed at his will and pleasure the purposes and thoughts of men another way far divers. His Temple & image they erected in the Tuscan street, near to the altars of Ceres and Cora. The festivall daies of this god, celebrated in the month of October, are called Vertumnalia. Some there be that would have Vertumnus and Janus with four faces to be all one; upon this reason, for that they affirm the Temple of Janus afore said to be in Velabrum, whereas they build that of Vertumnus. But now that Temple whereof we have before spoken, upon four pillars beareth up one roof, and hath four gates besides, and in each forefront twelve little windows, which signify the four quarters of the year, and the twelve months. In old time they put Janus before, in all sacrifices, and gave him that name ex eundo, i.e. going, and hereupon the entries and doors of houses he called Janua.

Near the image of Vertumnus Pub. Africanus had an house, which Sempronius afterwards bought together with the wood-shops, and built the palace which they call Sempronius, near the Temple of S. Gregory in Velabrum.

CHAP. IX

Argiletum: the house of Cornelius: Aquinalium: the Chappell of Surgadry or Stadry.

THE Argiletum beginneth at the bottom of the Tuscan street, and endeth at the Theatre of Marcellus. But Fabius Pictor saith, it began at the head of the said Tuscan street, under Castellum, between between it and the great Lits, and so reacheth to the Aventine. The name is taken of a kind of clay or loam, whereof there is plenty in that place: or else of one Aryus, who being entertained as a guest by Evander, laid wait for his life, intending after he had murdered him, to be King, and reign himself. But the friends and company about Evander discovered his trains, and so he was by them slain. Unto him therefore Evander reared a tomb even there, and consecrated the place.

Now Imus Argiletus is just by the Theatre of Marcellus. In this street were divers shops of artisans or artificers, and especially of stationers or booksellers, and those they commonly called the Argiletan shops.

Cornelius Domitianus is said to have dwelt in Velabrum.

Equimulium is between Velabrum and the Capitol, near to the staplers and wooll-shops. The name arose hereupon for that Sp. Maelius, a Roman Citizen who aspired to be King, sometime there dwelt: who being detected of that crime, was killed, his goods confiscated and his house laid level with the ground, and the plot where it stood by the Romans was made a void-yard.

The Temple of Mars, goddess of Idleness, was under the Aventine, upon the ascent of the hill called Clivus Publicus, in that part whereas folk go up to the Church of S. Prisca. Hereupon the mount Aventine was sometimes called Martius.

Morover, somewhere be that in this place would have the Asylum to stand: but we have shewed before that Asylum was first built by Rom, upon the Capitol. But in process of time, after that so great riches and wealth was gathered and laid up there in the Capitol, and that otherwhiles the Senat used there to meet and sit in councils the Rom, thought it not with the safest for them that thieves, fellows, and other lewd infamous persons of all sorts, should come for refuge thither, and there abide: and therefore they supposed it better for their security to translate this privileged sanctuary to some other place. Whereupon not there alone, but in many other parts afterwards there began sanctuaries to be set up, not at Rome only, but also in other quarters of the world.

CHAP. X.

Circus what it is, why it was so called, and for what cause ordained.

The place where games & exercises of disport were performed, was called the Circus: so named, for that the scaffold was built in circuit round about to behold the pastimes: and within that compass the said solemnities were exhibited: also for that the pomp was carried in shew, and the horses ran about the goals there. Built it was round, but longwise like an arch or bow, having in the circuit about it steps one above another, with apt seats for the beholders, that one should not hinder the prospect of another: in the midst were two marks or goals distant alike one from the other. Also the barriers or carceres so called, because the horses stood there pent and kept in until the Magistrate gave the signal to begin the course.

Now these solemnities of games and plaies are festivals in the honour of their gods: for ordained they were first, and still are observed and kept, either for their birth-dates & nativities, or dedications of Temples. And at the very first verily were hunting and baiting of beasts, which they called (Munera) to the honour of Saturn. But the stage-plaies were due to Liber: the Circensian games to Neptune and Ceres. Thus these pastimes were assigned, some to these gods, and others to those: and in honour and memoriall of them yearly solemnized. As for the games Circensies, they were so called, because when they were to be performed, they had the bank of the river of one side, and swords set to flank the other. But of these games, plaies, and solemn fights, Sisinnius hath written at large.

CHAP. XI.

The great shew-place called Circus Maximus.

Tarquinius Priscus instituted first this large circuit for running of races, and laid the foundation thereof between the two mounts Aventine and Palatine. But Caesar was he that enlarged it, and made it more magnificent and stately. For being (as it was) three furlongs and an half in length, and four acres broad: it is thought that it was Caesar and not Tarquinius, who set it out to that largeness: and this soundeth like to a truth, considering that in Tarquinius daies the City was not so populous, neither given so much to these shews and fights, as in the time of Caesar, and therefore the place required not so great a compass of ground. Now this Circus for three parts thereof, to wit, the two sides and one of the ends, had a ditch digged ten foot deep, and as many broad: behind that ditch were galleries built three stories high: and these had seats made beneath with stone, and above of timber: all which galleries had one and the same bases for they closed together round like a globe. Able they were to receive a hundred and fifty thousand men. See more hereof in Dionysius, Pliny, Livy, and others who have written of the Roman Edifices. This Circus Augustus adorned and beautified afterwards: for he made the barriers of marble, and gilded the goals, and many other ornaments he set it out withall. Lastly, when it was decayed and fallen down, Trajan reedified it, made it more ample, and trimmed it up. Yea, and after him, Heliogabalus set thereto besides most fair and goodly Columns, and garnished them with gold, and paved the very floor with Chrysocolla. But as touching the beauty of this Circus, Nazarius writeth much. For, by report, so elegant it was, that men resorted to it, not so much to behold the exercises and masteries there, as the pleasant and delightful beauty of the place. Maximus therefore it was called, either because consecrated it was to Vortunus, the

the greatest of the gods, or for the excellency and sumptuousness of the games: or else because in comparison of other Cirques, to wit, Flaminia, and the other called Intimus, i.e. the inmost, this was the biggest. For Pliny hath left in writing, that it lay out in length three furlongs, and one in breadth, so as it would well serve for two hundred and sixty thousand men to sit within it.

CHAP. XII.

The Temples and Altars which we read to have been in the Circus Maximus; or about it.

Confus is reported to be the god of Counsell, either for that he concealeth mens counsels, or Copeneth them unto men. This God had an altar in the great shew-place covered over, which betokeneth, that counsell ought to be close and covert. For which cause, this altar as we read, was by the old Romans to him consecrated. For they at what time as they consulted about the ravishing of the Sabine maidens, fearing lest they should have been detected before the time, dedicated this altar to this god, and created the portraiture and image of him thereon. Which altar verily, either by some injury of the times, or through mens neglect of the gods, continued so forlet, as it the end it was altogether unknown where it stood. At length found it was again, and at all other times remained covered, but in the time of horse-runnings; and then it was uncovered and set open. To this god was the feast also instituted, called Consualia. And those disports and pastimes which they devised for the ravishment of the Sabin Virgins, were celebrated at this altar by certain Priests belonging to that god.

In like manner Neptune, (urnamed the Chevalier, had a Temple in this Circus Max. which in the year of our Lord 1526 was found behind the Temple of S. Anastasia, at the foot of the mount Palatine, in the very foundations of the Circus: for such marks and tokens were there to be seen, that by good evidences it appeared that this was the very Temple of Neptune. For the honour of this Neptune, the games Circenses were by men in old time solemnized.

Also to Genius the guide and director of secret plots, they directed an altar in the great Cirque; Over and besides these, this Cirque contained three other altars: one to the Great gods; a second to the Penates; and a third to those gods of heaven and earth, from whom all things arise and have their beginning. These gods above said, the Romans called Genii, Penates, Presidents, and keepers of the City.

Liber, Libera, Ceres, and Proserpina, had their Temples about this place, called Circus Max. which Posthumius when he warred against the Latines, vowed; and the same man upon his return with happy victory built and dedicated them accordingly.

To conclude, in the same compass were the Temples of the sun, and of Flora.

Moreover, a Temple there stood near this Circus, unto Venus; which Q. Fabius Gurgus the Col. caused to be made of the money, raised upon the fines of certain wives that were condemned for playing false with their husbands.

Lucius dedicated a Temple to Juventus without the great cirque, not far from that place.

In like sort, Mercury had a Temple near this Circus Max.

In Plinies daies there was seen in the Circus Max. the image of Fortuna Seia.

CHAP. XIII.

The Naumachy of the great Cirque.

Naumachy is a place so called ἡ ναυμαχία τοῦ κυρίου, i.e. for that in it they used to skirmish with ships. For there were places digged deep like ponds, where were represented some shews of navall fight, for the exercise of the Roman youth, that they might know how to charge and annoy the enemy at sea also. And these kind of sports were exhibited and practised not in the cirques only, but also in the Amphitheatres.

CHAP. XIV.

The two Obelisks of the Circus Max.

The Obelisk (as Marcellinus testifieth) was a very huge and rough stone rising like a spire or brooch, by little and little to a mighty height: and that it might resemble a ray or sun-beam, it groweth smaller and smaller in fashion of a steeple, with four sides or edges, and in the top it is very narrow, and there made plain and smooth right artificially. In most of them are engraven and cut certain Hieroglyphick notes, and namely, such as testifie either the sounder thereof, or else other memorable matters. Of these figures and characters, the same Marcellinus speaketh in this wise: Moreover, the infinite variety of forms and characters, called Hieroglyphicks which all about we see engraven, the ancient authority of the first learning did set forth and mark so. Thus much saith he. Now they drew and portraied therein sundry forms and shapes of living beasts and birds, and oftentimes devised new and strange resemblances, whereby they reserved and kept for their posterity whatsoever was memorable and worth remembrance. This manner continued not in Egypt only, but also in other parts of the world, untill such time as letters were found: and then this was given over. At the first one letter implied a whole word and one word went for a whole sent ence. But hereof ye shall find much in authors that have written of these characters. Moreover, as Pliny witnesseth, these Obelisks were made of the stone Simites. Then they erected and consecrated consecrated to the gods; and principally to the Sun: and therefore in hewing and cutting them, they resembled the sun-beams, as we said before. The first that ever devised these Obelisks, was K. Methres. At Rome were none of these Obelisks wrought and cut out, but brought thither from other parts, and so for beautifull shew and to wonder as were erected. Therefore in the Cirque aforesaid, called Maximus, two Obelisks were seen, one standing upright aloft, 80 foot high: the other lying along in the Naumachi; it carried in length a hundred and thirty foot and 8 inches, besides the base or footstall; which Augustus translated to Rome out of Hieropolis, a City of Egypt: but when he would have set it up on end it fell down and brake in twain. This was hewn out of the quarry, by King Samnefretus, in whose reign Pythagoras was in Egypt.

CHAP. XV.

The arch of Sertinius in the Cirque. The place of the Tuberos in the Cirque. The stews, the house of Pompey, and the fountain of Juturna.

Sertinius having made conquest of Spain, brought great store of money into the City chamber: and of the spoils taken from enemies he reared two arches: the one in the beast-market, called Forum boarium; the other in the great shew-place, named Circus Maximus. Upon these arches he set golden images, and other ornaments to beautifie them.

The house and family of the Helii was none of the wealthiest, but yet of great credit and estimation with the Romans. Among whom there was so great concord & unity, that 16 of them at one time dwelt and agreed well together in one and the same house. For their singular prowess and worthy acts they were allowed by the Senat and people of Rome a scaffold by themselves in all the shew-places and Theatres, to behold all fights and masteries of activity.

About the Circus Maximus stood the stews and brothell-houses, where sometimes harlots and naughty-packs kept, such as made profession of whoredom. But this place was afterwards laid even with the ground, and is now a void place.

The house of Pompey was near the Circus Max. & therein was the statue of Hercules erected.

The fountain or well of the nymph Juturna, is yet (as some think) to be seen, boiling up in the Velabrum near the common sink or vault called Maxima.

CHAP. XVI.
The Septizonium of Severus.

Here should follow by course after the great Cirque, the fixt part of the City, namely, the mount Calvus. But because we meet with the Septizonium of Severus, & the arch of Constantine (before we come to Calvus) between it and the mount Palatine, something would first be spoken of them, especially being so excellent building as they are. The Septizonium therefore is a mighty mount or terrace raised from the plain ground 4 square, comprised about with seven arcades, that is to say, courses of rows of pillars one above another, yielding as it were as many porches or galleries: and in this order they are disposed, that the higher the pillars stand, the lesser and shorter they be. In the midst hereof, four walls arise, containing within them certain hollow places like cabinets. In the top thereof were bestowed and laid the ashes of Kings and Emperors deceased. Jul. Capitolinus nameth this mount Septadium, for the Greeks call places much frequented, whereunto many waies lead. Hepodia of Attica, seven, and so on a way. Pliny calleth it Septisolum, of seven lots or solars. For in every corner thereof the columns meet together in the head with marbles iraniomes. Other beams there be are besides, reaching inward from them to the mount it self, so as every such course yielded a stage like a gallery or walking place. Two of these Septizantia we read there were at Rome, to wit, the one of Titus in the street called Via nova, of right great antiquity, not far from this of Severus: of which at this day there is to be seen no shew or token at all. The other of Severus, whereof there remain still, over against S. Gregorius Church 3 Zones or girdles (as it were) of curious work; for the beauty and stateliness of the pillars worth the seeing, and pleasant to behold. Reared it was in the broad street called Appia and built by Severus himself. That which now is left thereof leaneh out so, as it seemeth ever and anon ready to fall.

CHAP. XVII.

The triumphal arch of Constantine the Emperor.

These triumphal arches were erected for them only, who having subdued whole Provinces, or conquered foraine nations & obtained brave & fortunate victories, seemed worthy of triumph, and thereupon they are called Triumphal arches. Upon these arches for the perpetual and everlasting memoriall of acts achieved, were cut and engraven the portraictures of the very places where the war was performed: the resemblances of Fabricks and ranged battels, if the service was on land; and of ships if it were at sea. Howbeit, until the time of the Emperors, no man raised any arches, and in Plinies daies they began to be built, so as that of Titus is of all others most ancient. For before their age, only statues and trophies were set up. But in process of time following, many of these arches were raised; among which, that of Constantine is to be seen above the rest at the corner of the mount Palatine, near the Theatre, beautified with triumphall ornaments, and and remaineth at this day in a manner found and whole without any hurt. This arch Constantine erected for himself upon the victory which he obtained over Maximian at the bridge Millvian.

CHAP. XXVII.

Caelius the mount, and Caeliolus.

The mount Caelius in old time was named Quercetalepinus, for the number of oaks there growing; but afterwards it was so called of the Gellius the Roman, a Duke of the Tuscan nation, unto whom the Romans granted a place in that mountain to inhabit. For when as the Tuscan people, by reason of their multitude, and the strong fenced places which they held, were suspected, commanded they were to remove into a street which of themselves was named Thuscum. But such as were without suspicion, kept the hill Caelius or Caeliculus, i.e. the little Caelius: a place where sometime the goddess Diana was worshipped, and at this day there standeth the Church consecrated to S. Evangelista the virgin. This mountain afterwards by Tiberius was named Augustus.

CHAP. XXIX.

The Temples of Faunus, Venus, and Cupid; the Court Hostilia; the forum camp; the house of the Laterans; the Palace of Constantine, and Casorianus; the horseman statue of L. Verrius.

Upon the ridge or side of the mount Caelius there standeth a round Church, now patronized by S. Stephen, but hallowed and consecrated in times past to Faunus. Faunus he was called, in the city, for that he foretold things to come, by voice and not by signs. The Albans in old time inhabited that part of the hill, where at this day the Church stands of S. Mary Dominick.

In the hill Caelius stood sometime the Temples of Venus and Cupid, not far from the gate Navia, where now is the Church of the holy Cross in Hierusalem.

The Court Hostilia was in two places of Rome, the one in the common Forum, hard by the Temple of Peace, where King Hostilius first dwelt; the other in that place, where afterwards the Church of S. John and S. Paul was built.

A place there was in the mount Caelius called Castra Peragrina, toward the Northeast and the Esquilia, where at this time the Church of the four crowned Saints is frequented.

The house of the Laterans also was built upon the same mount, at the Palace or stately Hall of the Laterans.

The Palace of Flavius Constantinus, near the house of the Laterans, stood between the gates Capitoline and Gabina.

The Palace of Casorianus was built at the gate Navia, and the Church of S. Holy Cross in Hierusalem.

In the street called Lateranensis stood the statue on horseback of L. Verrius. Some say it was made for M. Aurelius Antoninus, others for Septimius Severus.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the Amphitheatres; and first of that of Statilius Taurus.

Now it followeth to speak of the Amphitheatre of Statilius Taurus, but before we write thereof, it would be briefly shewed what an Amphitheatre is. Now this word Amphitheatrum cometh of Amphi, i.e. of looking round about; for two prospects joyned in one, make the form of an hemisphere or half circle. Some think that Titus devised the Amphitheatre first, but some say and prove, that C. Caesar built the first that ever was in Italy: but by the authority of Strabo it is proved, that Statilius raised one Amphitheatre before Titus.

In these Amphitheatres were prizes and rewards propounded to them that would fight with beasts. Condemned persons like wise yielded there to the eyes of men a horrible and fearful sight to behold, for thither were those prisoners brought by the Lictors, within that enclosure to wrestle and maintain conflict with wild beasts.

Moreover, the Emperors before they took their journey to any war or expedition, exhibited unto the people in these Amphitheatres shews of sword-fencers at the sharp for life and death, to the end, that the souldiers should be acquainted with fight, and learn not to be afraid of weapons, of wounds, no, nor at bloodshed, nor to draw back and avoid the perils of war to come, for the novelty and strangeness thereof. A great part of Statilius his Amphitheatre, is yet to be seen near the walls, at S. Crispi Church in Hierusalem. And be it sometime he built it, when Augustus Caesar encouraged and exhorted the Citizens of Rome, every man according to his ability to beautify and adorn the City.

CHAP. XXXI.

The water conduits why they were devised, by whom, and where they were conveyed into the City, to what purpose, by whom devised, how many.

The City of Rome in the beginning hath been said in the first book, was but narrow of compass, and contained within small bounds: and the people for commodity and store of water, settled settled upon the river Tyber. But as the city daily more and more encreased, necessary it was that some should build them houses and habitation in one place, some in another, farther from the river: whereupon distressed it was for want of water, which was to be fetched so far off, and that with great pain and labour: besides, those places which had no current of running waters to wash away the filth, and carry it into Tyber, became (by the noisome air which was infected with their loathsome and stinking smells) unwholesome, and subjected many times to the pestilence. Prince Nerva therefore (the Emperor) undertook to redress and remedy this mischief (and others after him by his example) and devise by the wit and subtilty invention of men, conduit-pipes, to bring water into those parts of the city which otherwise had none: And this verily they did two waies, the one by ached work, when by digging certain rills or rivulets the water was carried level above ground, forced by certain weights, ballasts, and counterpoises the other by vaults under the ground, bringing water into the city by secret under-waies through pipes, apertures, and rocks. By which means it came to pass, that in the city every where such store there was of water, that each house almost had a well in it. But especially at the bottom and foot of the hill Quirinalis, and all the side thereof, in the street Patricius, Subura, the Latine way, the Aventine, the Jews Street, and in many other places: so as in this our age full is of such water-works under the ground. Now were these waters conveyed from divers places, and some conduits especially, such as were devised by arches were higher or lower than other. In the beginning and in the former times, there were (by report) five heights or depths: The highest of all was new Anio; next, the waters Claudia; in the third place the water Julia; Tepula in the fourth; then Martia, and after it old Anio, the level or current whereof, Virgo followeth and Appia, and the lowest of all others, Astretina, which serves that quarter of the city beyond Tyber, and other low places built upon the plain. These waters were first brought into certain great conduit-heads, and from thence they were by a certain measure distributed by the conduit officer, and so ran into places appointed. Now that great conduit-head was called Castellum, which receiveth first the common water, and afterwards sendeth it out into divers and sundry parts, and the keeper or officer that overseeth it is named Castellarius. There were besides level or above ground, certain cisterns or receptacles of water, which kept water to serve curriers, fullers, and other such artificers for their necessary use. Over these waters were appointed certain wardens and keepers, and a set number of labourers and workmen to be thereto. Finally, a grievous punishment was to be inflicted upon them that either marred and hurt the conduit-heads, or derived and conveyed water to other places than the laws or publike ordinances, or the Censors or Ædiles permitted: or took more water than at the first was allowed them. Appian Claudian (by report) was the first man that brought water into the city by arched work. But of the Roman waters, of the conduits, and other matters contained thereabout, of the manner of conveyance, the instruments, measures, and weights thereto belonging read Frontinus, who of these things hath written orderly and at large: Also have recourse to Bar. Ruffus, who of the same argument hath made a good treatise. In the time of Frontinus there were but nine waters and no more brought into the City, namely, Appian, old Anio, Martia, Tepula, Julia, Virgo, Astretina, called also Augusta, Claudia, and new Anio. Ruffus reckoned ten more, whereby it appeareth, that he wrote long after Frontinus.

CHAP. XXII.

The conduit or conveyance of Aqua Claudia.

Calpurnia began two conduits, but left them unfinished when he died. Claudian the Emperor of famous memory, took them in hand again, and in most magnificent manner made an end. To the one of them, namely, which beginning at the fountains or springs called Caracallus and Curvus, was drawn to the City, he gave the name Aqua Claudia; the other, for difference sake of the two conduits of Anio, he called his own, or the new Anio; and distinct it was from that which is named old Anio. The water Claudia therefore was brought from the gate Nabia, along the side of the mount Calvus into the Aventine. A part also thereof Caracalla derived into the Capitol hill.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of those things which now in mount Calvus are not known where they stood.

Brutus the Consul having expelled Tarquin, built a Temple to the goddess Ceres in mount Calvus, to which goddess also, upon the accomplishment of his prayer and vows, he offered sacrifice. They in old time supposed that she had power over the vital members of the body, and to her tuition they committed those parts, and that she should preserve them safe, they did sacrifice upon her altars, and presented oblations.

Agrippina likewise began to build a Temple to Claudius Cæsar, which after her death Vespasian finished, and Nero utterly destroyed to the very foundation: this also was erected in the same hill. Mahornus Porcius Cato, Master of Cæsar's Carpenters in France, was the first Roman that adorned and set out his house, which he had in Calvus hill with marble rough-cast. Moreover, the house of Claudius Centimalis stood upon the said hill. Also the house of the Torrici, who were two of the thirty tyrants. Likewise the house of Junius Senator, wherein, when as all other edifices and buildings upon that mountain were consumed with fire, the image of Tiberius remained unhurt. There also it is said of Titus Claudius Clypeus, the maker of hymns. In this hill was the great Macellum, or cave or den of Cyclops, the Spoliarium, and the armory.

CHAP. XXIV.

The main Appia, and Nova. The Temples of Isis, Vertue, Honour, Quirinus, Mars, and the river Almo.

Now follow those places which are worth the remembrance upon the hill Calvus toward the Aventine. And therefore the way or street called Appia we meet with first, which taking the beginning from the arch of Constantine, reacheth as far as Brundisium: and because afterwards it was paved and repaired by Caracalla, it took the name of Nova, i. e. the new causey. But that which properly is called Nova beginneth at the gate of Palatine, and along the foot of the Palatine hill, over the great Cirque called Maximus stretcheth out as far as to the lowest fish-pool, where now standeth the Church of S. Sixtus. Many other streets there were, called Nova. Take heed therefore that in their names you be not deceived, and lest ye think that to be spoken of one, which oftentimes was meant of many.

Between the Church of Sixtus, the Fish-pools, and the ruins of the Antonian bairns, there was the Church of Isis Antonodora, built by Antonius Bassianus.

The Temple of Honour and Vertue, not far from the street Appia, was vowed by the father of Marcus Marcellus at Clastidium in Gaul: and seventeen years after dedicated by his son Marcellus.

Two Temples there were of Mars, one called the Temple of Quirinus within the City, near to the gate of that name, the other upon the way Appia without the City.

The river Almo runneth along the way Appia, under the foot of the Aventine into the Tiber. It beginneth ten miles from the City in the territory Marinum: which commonly afterwards they called the river of Appia. In this river the goddess, named the mother of the gods, was every year wont to be washed by her Priests, called Galli.

CHAP. XXV.

Of baths and bairns in generall.

Therma properly hath the signification from a Greek word, thermē, which betokeneth hot. But we use to call those places which either having hot waters, or without them are heat with a stouph, appointed either to wash and bath, or to sweat, by the Greek name Therma. That the Romans used in old to bath and wash themselves of more than we now adaies, is testified by many and divers authorities of writers: and for sundry causes, they were wont so to do [as yet the manner is amongst us] namely, to scour away sweat, or to wash dust off, in like sort for health and pleasure: whereby it came to pass, that every man, if he were but of mean wealth, had in a manner a privat bath or hot-house by himself: but the same were devised and contrived after divers and sundry sorts. For many publique baths there were ordained for the common people to use at their pleasure. Serv. Orat. invented first and made the pendant or hanging baths. But after that and superfluity abounded in excess, the bathing houses were built with wonderfull cost and magnificence, so as they seemed to keep no mean nor measure, as appeareth by the very reliques and ruins thereof at this day. And those places where they built these bairns and hot-houses they called Therma: which contained within them divers places, and an infinite number of roomes, bearing sundry names, and serving to as many uses. For some were appointed to heat waters, and those were round built, from whence hot water was let into the bairns, not to them only that were on the ground beneath, but also to those which were pendant and hanging aloft: which water after they had done washing, being foul and good for nothing was conveyed by certain pipes and spouts into sinks. They had other rooms also called Apoditeria, wherein they that were to go into the bath put off their cloaths and laid them by. In the same places were courtyards, having about them most spacious porches or cloisters, built with arched and embowed roofs most stately: wherein were marble pillars, garnished with divers and sundry colours. In like manner pavements of stone, and walls feeled and hung with marble tables. Also close walking galleries, groves, and swimming places, all for the pleasure and contentment of the people, where they might refresh and solace themselves. These delights so drew and allured mens minds, as that they would walk oftentimes in one day, yea, and in these bairns the Princes were wont to sup and bath with other persons whosoever, as it fell out. They had besides private baths to themselves most sumptuously built, and gorgeously set out. And namely, Antoninus Caracalla, at his own charges edified certain baths, which by his name were called Therma Antonina. The huge ruins thereof are yet to be seen, some of the pillars still stand, others are thrown down. Some say, they were begun only by Antoninus, but finished and adorned by Severus. They stood about the foot of the Aventine, near the street-way leading to Ardea, where now is the Church of S. Balbina. Under these baths there stood a most goodly Palace, built by the same Antoninus, but at this day there is scarce any example or shew thereof.

CHAP. I.

The Etymology of the mount Aventine.

THe Aventine is of the Roman hills the fourth in order. The compass and form whereof, because we have already described in the first book, needles here it is to repeat. But it remaineth to declare, how it came so called, what Temples of the gods, and what other edifices be therein. The Aventine therefore, some think, took the name of birds which were wont to flie unto this hill, there to nestle: others, of a King of the Albans, slain and buried there. There be again who suppose, that the Sabins, who being by the Romans enfranchised Citizens, there settled and made abode gave the name to this hill of Avantes, a river in their Province. Varro affirmeth that it was so called of a ferrage: For as it hath been said a little before, this mount was divided from the rest, and from the City by certain lakes and the Tyber, whereupon, they that would go to it used to ferry over in small punts or wherries. Some guess, that it came to have that name of resort unto it, for that the Latines used in great frequency to repair unto the holy Temple of Diana there. Romulus also it was named of Romus who chose a place in the top thereof to sit for to take the sight of birds for Augury, and in the end was there entered: Romulus therefore commanded that it should not be inhabited, because he would have had it wholly consecrated to his brother. This hill Ancus Martius afterward compassed with a wall, and granted leave to as many as would there to dwell: howsoever, there be some that think it stood void untill the time of Claudius, the Emperor of happy memory, as being an ominous place and unfortunat, by reason of foul birds that haunted it, and therefore not to be received within the wals. But the truth is, when the Romans grew populous, they joynd this mountain also to the rest of the City.

Aventinus.

CHAP. II.

The Temples of Diana, Dea bona, Hercules Victor, Queen Juno, Moneta, Luna, Victory, Minerva, and Liberty. The Altar of Jupiter Elicius.

IN the top of mount Aventine toward the Tyber, there standeth the Church of S. Sabina, that every place where aforesaid was the holy chappel of Diana. The feast and holiday of bondslaves was wont to be kept at Rome the thirteenth day of August, for upon that day Servius Tullius, whose mother was a bond-woman, consecrated a Temple to Diana in Aventine, and ordained it to be a festival day for bond-servants, who as yet were patronized by Diana. Some think that this chappel was built by K. Ancus of that money which the Citizens conferred and contributed, who lately had been translated thither from Palatium. This Temple was common unto all the Latines, whereupon oftentimes they resorted thereunto.

Very near unto that place stood the Church of S. Mary, called Aventina. But in times past the place was consecrated to the goddess Bona, i.e. good. For Claudia a vestall virgin or Nun, built a chappel unto her in the honour of Fauna, sister of Faunus, a most chaste maid.

* Or rather daughter.

Upon the same bank and brow of the hill, where at this day S. Alexius Church standeth, was sometime the Temple of Hercules Conqueror. And near unto it another of Juno Regina, built by Camillus with the pillage got in Veii. In the ruinat place of Decius the Emperors bains there was a Temple also of Hercules, where the Christians afterwards consecrated a Church to S. Prisca.

On the side of the Aventine hill stood the chappel likewise of the Moon, as Ovid doth witness. Thus much of those buildings in the Aventine, which had a certain place thereupon in our knowledge: the rest following were doubtless in the Aventine, but in what part thereof they stood, it is unknown after so long time, and namely, the Temple of Victory built by the Arcadians, and in honour of whom they offer sacrifice yearly. Minerva and Juno had their Temples there in the same hill, by the testimony of approved authors. To Liberty a Temple was built and dedicated by the father of T. Gracchus, with the money taken for fines and forfeitures. The cloister belonging to that Temple was by Elia Patus and Cornelius Cethegus Censors repaired and enlarged, and last of all by Pollia also re-edified. Now this S. Liberty, the Romans honoured above all others, and in defence and maintenance thereof, they ever shewed themselves most resolute and constant.

Upon the same hill, Numa reared the altar of Jupiter Elicius, so called ab eliciendo, i.e. of fetching out secrets and hidden mysteries.

In like manner there stood an old altar of Murcia in that hill. Now they named Venus Murcia, of the Myrtle tree consecrated unto her: or as some interpret, because Venus, immoderate and excessive, maketh a man to be Murcus or Murcidus, i.e. sluggish, sloathful, idle, and good for nothing.

The Temple of Juno Moneta was likewise built and dedicated upon that hill.

Camillus in the same mount consecrated a chappel to dame Matuta.

The wood or grove, also called Laurentum or Laurentina, consecrated unto Jupiter, was there: in which Emperor Valentinian [the second] son of Constantine, and Galla Placidia was slain, as Pliny witnesseth.

CHAP. III.

Cacus, and his hole or Cave.

Cacus, by report of the Poets, was the son of Vulcan, whom they believed in old time to breathe out of his mouth fire and smoak. This Cacus infested the places near unto him with robbing and spoiling. But more probable it is, that he was a most lewd and theevish servant of Evander, and therefore the Arcadians called him κακός, i.e. naught. A cave he haunted, as by very good conjectures is certainly gathered, in Aventine toward Tyber, over-against the Church of S. Mary Aventine, whereas the river runneth nearest to the hill, and whereas there hangeeth over a vast and huge craggy rock, as fit a place as might be to make a starting hole and cave for such an one, and near it is to the gate Trigemina. Him when Hercules had killed and sacrificed, he reared an altar unto Jupiter Invenitor, near to the said cave or den.

CHAP. IIII.

The Armilustrum, and some other things in generall.

Armilustrum was a place where souldiers shewed themselves and their armor, and where they used to muster: where also in their arms they sacrificed and did service to their gods, with resounding loud trumpets. Some would have it to be in the Aventine, others in the Cirque Maximus: but that matters not much. Hither the souldiers used to repair when they were returned from war, and here they laid up their harness and weapons. For armor of their own and in their privat custody the Romans had not, to use in the wars: but delivered all up to be kept safe either in the Armilustrum, or the tower or castle upon the rock Tarpeia.

In Aventine, near the Temple of Juno Regina, were the Scala Gemonia, that is to say, a steep place with a downfall: where wicked malefactors, drawn with a crook, were most miserably executed and killed.

There stood sometime this hill, near the Temple of Diana, the house of Phyllis.

A part of this mountain was called Remuria; which Remus chose to dwell in: and being there by his brother Romulus committed to the earth, he gave it his name.

The Senat and people of Rome built in this mountain, to the honour of Decius the Emperor, the baths called Deciana, and others also near them, named Variana. Moreover, the bains of Trajan were in this place, where now the vineyard of Francis Albertinus is.

The caves of Fannus and Picus also were in the Aventine, as fables report. Italus likewise dwelt in the Aventine, as M. Cato recordeth.

The Temples and edifices of this hill all in generall were (by report) burnt in the daies of Tiberius, sometime Emperor.

CHAP. V.

The sheard hill, and other things within that compass.

The plain and levell ground between Aventine, Tyber, and the City wall, hath four sides, but uneven: in which there riseth a little hill, commonly called Teflacens. The whole compass hereof will hardly be measured with 2000 paces: the height is about 160 foot. It resembleth in shew the form of a gourd: and the one side of it which regardeth the Tyber is broader than the other. Near to this hill was the glaſs-makers street (and the potters) also the carpenters habitation. And no man doubteth, but hereupon arose and grew the mount called Teflacens. For in old time, at Rome and elsewhere, as also in some places now adaies, much use there was commonly of earthen vessels made by potters: which even by this may be certainly collected, for that in Numa's daies there were four colledges or societies of potters: and these made of clay, not only vessels, but also the images of the gods, and ornaments to beautifie and set out their Temples: pillars and wals were by potters work seeled in the outside, nay, the very dead bodies were bestowed in cophins of baked clay. Since then, in so great store of earthen vessels and potters work, much of necessity must needs be broken, which if they had been cast abroad in the corn-field and pasture grounds, would have made all barren and unfruitful: again, if they had been thrown into the water, would in time have choaked up the chanell of the current, and forced the river to swell and overflow the banks: Numa therefore commanded this kind of workmen to dwell in one place, and gave order to fling all that was good for nothing, as filth, ruff-raff, and broken sheards into one place: whereupon, in proceſs of time arose a mount which they called Teflacens. Among these potters there was a place hallowed to Venus Myrtea, as we find in some records.

CHAP. VI.

The Pyramides; the sepulchre of C. Cestius, and the garner of the people of Rome.

The Pyramides were huge towers four-square, rising up in height, sharp like to a flame, whereof they have the name πύρες πυρὸς, i.e. of fire. But Stephanus supposeth they were so called, πύρες πυρῶν, i.e. of wheat, because into that place where they were erected, wheat was brought out of

of all Egypt; which made a great dearth of corn. These at the beginning were reared by the Kings of Egypt; whereby to spend and consume their superfluous wealth and substance, whereof they had no use; for fourthly if they had gathered goods, and heaped up a deal of gold, silver, and other riches, they should thereby have given occasion unto some for to lie in wait to take their lives away: also, that the common people should not live in idleness. Afterwards, at Rome likewise they bestowed their money thereupon, for to make the world wonder, and to shew their vain-glory. There is yet one of them to be seen, standing upright at the gate Hofienfis, enclosed within a wall. And commonly it is said, that it was the monument or sepulchre of C. Cestius, one of the seven Septemvirs, called Epulones. But Blondus would seem to prove, that it was the place for buriall of the whole College and Society of those Septemvirs Epulones. Now were they called Epulones, who had the power to ordain and make feasts and solemn bankers to the gods.

It is written, that there were 140 garbets of the people of Rome, between the mount Testaceus and Tyber.

In the same compals of ground near Tyber was the lake or pool Hylerna.

Some also affirm, that there stood sometime in that quarter a little town called Capena.

CHAP. VII.

The sweating steeple, and the image of Jupiter.

But since the Esquiliae should next follow; but because it lieth between the way Laticana on the Southeast side, and the valley (which for the breadth of 400 foot encloseth that way) on the West we will rehearse what memorable things soever there be in the Laticana way and the valley afore said before we come to the mount Esquilia. In our return therefore to the triumphall arch of Constantina, where of we spake before, we will as we go discourse of the rest. Near then unto this arch there appeareth the half rundle of circumference of an old steeple made of brick, which Vitruvius calleth the sweating steeple: for that the spring doeth, thow sometime there gushed water out of it, whereby the common people, standing to behold the games and plaies in the next scaffold of the Theatre untill they were almost quenched their drought.

In the top hereof stood the brazen image of Jupiter, because their ancestors in old time, were wont when they made solemn sojourns to use the image of Jupiter. But for that it was a trouble either to carry with them or so send the said image, especially if they were to contract and establish any accords in far remote countries, therefore instead of the complete image they took the scepter only; which might betoken Jupiter the King of the gods, as well as if he had been there present full and whole.

CHAP. VIII.

The Amphitheatre of Titus Vespasianus. The Temples of Fortune and Quies.

Between the two hills Colinus and Esquiliae is there an Amphitheatre. This Vespasian built first, and afterwards Titus his son dedicted and beautified it with the baine, built, beat unto it with right great celerity and speed. This Amphitheatre was commonly called Colosseum, of Nero's Callosus, which was set up in the porch of Nero's house. In able same place of the Theatre were the two otes before time of Nero, whereof we will speak hereafter in this very book. This Amphitheatre they called also Arena, i.e. the sand-flower, because the ground was spread over and laid with sand; that the wrestlers might fall softer and take less hurt; also that the blood should be drunk up, to the end that the sword-fencers in combat might not be affraid upon the sight thereof, and so without less the fierceness and courage set upon the concurrent; and last of all, that the champions, whose bodies were anointed with oyle being behewwed with the sand, might with more ease take hold one of another. The whole Theatre and place is self within (which during those daies of the games was covered over with rent-cloth) would receive 80000 men. But hereof see more in Pliny, Pomponius Mela, and other writers of the Roman acts.

Fulvius Fabius built much further off this Amphitheatre, so goodly a Temple, as for state and magnificence there was hardly a temple in all Rome comparable unto it. Besides it, there were many other chappels at Rome, consecrated to Fortuna.

Likewise a Chappell of Quies and rest was built in the broad street Laticana.

CHAP. IX.

Of Esquiliae.

The mount Esquilia as well by Varrus as others is divided into many parts, and each part thereof took name of those captains who in times past before the City of Rome was built, there inhabited. For one was called Captius, another Oppius, and a third Septimius. But hereof Varrus writeth at large. The posterity following changed those names as we shall hereafter hear. Some think that Esquilia took the name of Excubia, i.e. watch and ward. For when Romulus had no very great trust in Tiber, he used to have a standing watch by night for fear he should be secretly forlaid and killed, or else turned out of his kingdom. Others suppose it was so named of fowlers, who there used to cast forth chaff, and such refuse of light corn, to beguile and catch the poor birds.

The side of the hill toward the broad way Laticlavia, which lieth between the Churches of the 40 martyrs of S. Clement, S. Peter in Vinculis, and S. Martin, was called by the name of Carina, as Virgil seemeth to testifie. From that part therefore, because it was first inhabited, we shall do well to begin our treatise.

CHAP. X.

The Carinae, the old Curia and the new.

These Carinae, according to their model and form were houses like to keels of ships, standing within the Temple of Tellus. Their ruins are yet to be seen near the Church of S. Peter in Vinculis, i.e. in bonds.

Near to that place was the old Curia built by Romulus: but the new was erected near to Comitum Fabricium, i.e. the Quarrefour or cross way of Fabricius.

CHAP. XI.

The bairns of Titus and Philip: the statue of Laocoon: the Palace of Vespasian: the houses of Balbinus and Pompey.

Here remain yet to be seen the tokens and prints (as it were) of Titus the Emperors bairns, not far from the Church of S. Martin in the hills: for there be great cisterns to receive water, which at this day be called Septem Sala, according to the number of those cisterns: and so far reached the house of Nero, called Aurea, i.e. golden.

Not far from thence, in the year of our Lord 1506, one Felix a Citizen of Rome, chanced to find in his vineyard the statue of Laocoon, made by those excellent workmen, Agelander, Polydorus, and Athenodorus, Rhodians, who with wonderful cunning portraied and cut most artificially in one intire stone, Laocoon himself, his children, and the admirable windings and foldings of the serpents about them. And now at this day is to be seen at the Vatican, in the palace of Vespasian, near the said bairns of Titus. See more of this you may in Pliny. As for the story it self, most learnedly and lively it is set out by Virgil, and there to be read. Behind these bairns of Titus, between East and North, the ruins of others besides are thought verily to be those of Philip the Emperor.

Above the bairns of Titus, some set Hadrian's bairns: for that this place is yet called Hadrianus. By the testimony of Lampridius it appeareth that Bulbinus his house was in Carina: There also was Pompey's house, in which Lenaxus his freed-servant taught grammar.

CHAP. XII.

The cliff Virbins, the house of Servius Tullius, the golden one of Nero, and that of Virgil, Mecenas his tower and hortiards: the Temples of Fortune and Felicity.

That part of the Esquilie, which overlooketh the Church of S. Laurence in Fontana, is named Clivus Virbins: there also is the grove Fagualis, wherein stood the mansion house of Servius Tullius.

Nero's house, called Golden took up all that space, which from that quarter wherein now Saint Gregories Church standeth, lay between Constantines arch, the Colosseum, the Carina Esquilie, and Mecenas hortiards. His house before was in his own fire where with he burnt the City, consumed also: and when he re-edified it anew, he called it Aurea. The spacious largeness whereof was such, that it had about it three porches of a mile compass a piece: It contained also a pool like another sea: walled it was about, and resembled a very city. There were to it belonging holts and hamlets country-like, vineyards pastures, woods, and beasts both tame and wild, of all sorts. The house and the porches were double guiled all over, and set out with precious stones. And in one word there was nothing wanting that might serve for pleasure or prodigall riot.

In the entry of this house there stood an huge image giant-like, called a Colossus, 120 foot high. After Nero's death, dedicated it was to the sun, and then changed the name. Now men think it was called Colossus, after his name who was the first deviser of all such statues.

Within the same house, Nero included also the chappell of Fortuna. This goddess being made of the stone Phengites, when all the doors were shut, gave light to the whole house within: such raies of radiant brightness casteth this kind of stone from it. This goddess Servius Tullius first consecrated, and of Segetes, i.e. standing corn, called her Deia.

At the bairns of Dioclesian, there is a street way leading up to S. Antonies Church in Esquilie, where stood sometime a most noble tower of Mecenas, within his own hortiards: for those most pleasant hortiards were in the plain of Esquilie. Here within was Prapus worshipped: upon which ill-favored Idol Virgil hath plaied much in verse.

Near the hortiards of Mecenas stood the said Virgil's house. The Temple of Felicity, which took up a part of that plot where Nero's Gold-house should stand was by him burnt.

Above those gardens or hortiards of Mecenas was raised a wonderful piece of work, called Aggeres Tarquinii Superbi, i.e. Tarquinii's bulwarks.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIII.

The Palace of Sifiminius; the plain and market place of Esquilæ; the grove Querquetulanus; also that of Juno Lacinia, and of Mars; the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune.

THe palace of Sifiminius in Esquilæ, stood (as they say) where the Church of S. Mary the greater now is.

The plain or field Esquilus, near the tower of Mecenas (called Inter montes); among the hills, is between the foresaid bulwarks and the City wall. This plot of ground was in times past called Foculus; because dead bodies were therein burnt. But when the stinking steam thereof was noisome to the City, the Citizens and Augustus Caesar by a generall consent gave the field unto Mecenas, where he made his goodly hollyards and most dainty gardens. Of which Cicero, with other, speaketh much.

In like manner, the market place Esquilinum was in the same hill.

That side of the Esquilæ which looketh toward the grove Querquetulanus had in it the grove of Juno Lacinia.

In the same Esquilæ was the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune.

In the way which goeth to the gate Interaggeres, even in the very bulwarks or rampiers of Targuinius stood the arch of Gordian made of marble, garnished also and set out with ornaments of triumph. Of the ruins thereof was S. Gregories Church in Damasus built.

CHAP. XIV.

The cliff Suburranus; the arch of Galienus; the shambles or flesh-market of Livia, or, as some would have it, Livianum; the Præstina way, and the Trophees of Marius.

AT the top or upper end of Suburra was the Clivus Suburranus, so called of Suburra, yielding an easie ascent from thence up into the Esquilæ.

Anon you meet with the triumphal arch of Galien the Emperor (where now standeth the Church of S. Vitus) making a goodly shew of the Tiburtine stone, whereof it was made. Near unto it was the shambles or market-place, called Macellum Livia, or Livianum. This, as some think, took the name of one Macellus; who being a notorious thief, and practising much to steal into the City, was in the end apprehended, and by the Censors condemned: and his house being seized as confiscate to the City was converted to a place wherein they sold meat and all other victuals; and so it kept still the name (as is said) of Macellum. Some are of opinion, that the said house was pulled down, and another built in the ruins thereof, which retained the name still of the former.

From hence beginneth the port-way Præstina, and leadeth to the gate Esquilina.

In this way you shall meet on the right hand with a huge bank of brick, half ruinat; upon which were erected two Trophies of marble; that is to say, certain posts [like Quintins] standing upright with spoils of enemies hanging thereupon; and they resembled men that were taken prisoners. It is said, that these Trophies were set up by Marius in his triumph for the Cimbric war: which when Sylla had cast down and overthrow, C. Caesar (afterwards Dictator) erected again. The place of the inhabitants thereabout, is at this day called Cimbrum. As touching Trophies, look to read more in Plutarch, Valerius Max. and others.

CHAP. XV.

The house of the Ælii; the chappell Marianum; the region or quarter called Tabernola; the bains and dwelling house of Gordian; the Palace of Caius and Lucius; also the Palace Licinianum.

THe house of the Ælii stood in that place where now be the monuments Mariana and the chappell of that name.

The plain part of the Esquilæ, between it and the mount Calvus, and the Basilica Lateranensis, is at this day called Merulana, for Mariana; and in old time, the region of Tabernola.

Near the Church of S. Ensebins, in the way of Præstina, was built the bains and habitation of Gordianus. The ruins of those hor-houses are yet to be seen, whereby a man may soon give an estimate, how fair, how stately, and large they were at first.

Between the gates Esquilina and Navia, not far from the walls, there be to be seen certain notable ruins: this they commonly call, the bains of Galutius. But in that place stood, in old time, that beautiful and famous palace which Caesar erected under the name of Caius and Lucius his nephews. Hard by the Church of S. Balbina, whereas now is the Bear called Pileatus, stood sometime the Palace Licinianum.

CHAP. XVI.

The water Martia or Trajana; and the Temple of Isis.

THe current of the water Martia, passing by the gate Trajana through the plain of Esquilæ went as far as to the bains of Dioclesian, unto the hills next adjoining. This in old time was called Anfera. It riseth out of the spring Piconia in the mountains of the Peligni, and passeth by the the Martians country and the lake Fucinus, and so runneth to Rome; the coldest and most wholesome of all other waters that run into Rome. This water Ancus Martius began first to bring into the City: afterward, Q. Marcius, surnamed Rex, took it in hand; and a long time after Agrippa repaired the conduit thereof. Of it read more in Pliny and Frontinus.

The Temple of Isis is by P. Victor placed in the quarter Esquilina.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Suburra; the house of Cæsar and Lælia; and the street Patricius.

Suburra is a street of all other most frequented: it beginneth at the Forum Romanum, and goeth on forward directly by the Forum Nervæ up to the hanging or rising of the hill called Clivus Suburræus, whereof we have written before in this book; and it endeth where the way Prænestina beginneth. Called it was Suburra, either for that it sustained and bare up the Carina and the wall under it: or because it lay under the old City; or as Varro thinketh, of the burrough of Succusanius. In this street Suburra was the house of Cæsar, so long as he contented himself with a mean estate.

In it were sometimes certain stews and brothel-houses, as Martial writeth.

The street Patricius windeth crooked from the hill Viminalis; and endeth at the baths of Dioclesian. Of it more hath been said in the former book.

The house of Lælia likewise was in the same street, as Martial witnesseth.

CHAP. XVIII.

Suburra in the Plain; and the Temple of Sylvanus.

The mount Viminalis on the West-side of it hath part of the Quirinalis opposite against it: and the vale lying between was named Suburra the plain.

In the same valley in times past were the ten Tabernæ; so called of the number.

The pit also of S. Proba was in the same hill; which Proba her self made near to the Church of S. Marci in the field.

At the foot in manner of the hill Viminalis, over-against S. Agatha's Church there stood the Temple of Sylvanus; as appeareth by many good tokens.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the hill Viminalis; the Palace of Decius; the Laver of Agrippina; the baths of Olympias and Novatus; the dwelling houses of Q. Cæcilius, Crassus, and C. Aquilius.

Varro reckoneth the hill Viminalis among the Esquilæ. Viminalis it was named of Jupiter Viminalis, whose altars were in that hill: or else of plenty of Ofers there growing.

In the highest rising and ascent of that hill, there stood in old time, (where now is the Church of S. Lawrence in Panisperna) the Palace of Decius the Emperor, as may be shewed by the ruins thereof.

Not far from the same place, toward the Church of S. Vitalis, were the lavers or washing places of Agrippina a mother to Nero.

The baths of Olympias were situate toward Suburra; the tokens whereof are now found in the brow of the hill.

Likewise the baths of Novatus were built upon the hill Viminalis, where the Church of S. Prudence standeth.

The hill Viminalis had also three goodly houses of most noble personages, to wit, of M. Crassus, Quintus Cæcilius, and Cæcilius Aquilius: the marks whereof are evident to be seen in the side of the said hill.

Upon the same hill in times past a certain feastivall sacrifice was solemnized, which the dwellers and inhabitants there, call Faginal.

CHAP. XX.

The baths of Dioclesianus; the Library Ulpia; the plain Viminalis; the gate Interagere; and the vale Quirinalis.

The baths of Dioclesian are to be seen all ruin'd on the side of the hill Viminalis: and by their ruins a man may easily gather how stately and magnificent they were sometime. These were begun by Dioclesian and Maximinian Herculanus: in the building whereof 40000 Christians were held to work many years together in most slavish manner.

These were afterwards finished and dedicated by Constantine and Maximinian, new Emperors. Of the vain and superfluous expences which the Romans laid out upon Baths, read Seneca, who depainteth out their wastfulness most excellently.

In the same baths was the Library Ulpia, which by Hadrian, or (as some think) by Trajan, was thither translated: wherein were the linen records, and those huge volumes, called the Elephantine books, in which the acts of the Emperors, and all the functions and ordinances of Senat were, as Pollus witnesseth.

Behind these bairns, from above the rampier or bulwark of Tarquinius Superbus, was the plain field Viminalis, which spreadeth out as far as to the City wall. There is seen as yet the gate Interaggeres shut; albeit it seemeth more probable and like to a truth, that it stood in the plain Esquilinus.

In that very place there was a pit or well of spring running water, which the neighbours dwelling thereby called the pit of the Vivarium, or the park pit, within which park they kept enclosed divers and sundry kinds of wild beasts. The harbours and dens of these wild beasts are yet to be seen: whereupon it cometh, that those places or parks which are set out and appointed for feeding of Deer, we use to call Vivaria.

The space between Diocletians baths and Constantines arch is named the vale Quirinalis: in which they say, that Romulus met with Proculus.

In the same was the sacred chappell of Fortuna Publica.

CHAP. XXI.

The mount Caballus: the Etymology of Quiritalis: the tower Militiarum: the bairns of Paulus: the chappell of Neptune: the bairns of Constantine: the house and street of the Cornelius.

THe hill which at this day they name Caballus was in old time called Quirinalis, as by many signs and reasons may be proved: to as no man skillfull in the Roman story, need to doubt thereof.

This Quirinal hill, the sixt in order of the mountains of Rome, (as Varro testifieth) taketh that name of the Temple of Quirinus: after others, of the Quirites, who coming with Tatius from Chures, there pitched their tents and lodged. This mountain is shaped long, for it comprehendeth that little hill which is between the gate Collina and Collatina. Upon it standeth the Obelisk of the Moon, engraven with Egyptian hieroglyphick characters. In breadth, from the North Southward, it reacheth to a tower, now called Comitium.

In the pitch and top of the hill, above the Forum of Trajanus, you shall see the tower called Militiarum: where in old time the souldiers of Trajan kept their standing guard, and gave the tower that name.

On the same ridge were the bairns of Paulus built: which place at this day by a corrupt name, is called Bagnana-Poli.

In the descent and hanging of the Quirinal hill toward Saburra stood sometime the chappell of Neptune, which appeareth by the pictures and other reliques there found.

From hence toward the North were the hot-houses of Constantine, as the ruins of the place do testifie.

The house of the Cornelius was built in the street so called, and at this day the name it keepeth still. But more hereof elswhere.

CHAP. XXII.

The Temples of Saturn, the Sun, and Bacchus: Quirinus his Temple and porch: the old Capitoll: the Chappells of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva: the house of Pomponius Atticus.

IN the Cornelian street (whereof a little before we made mention) were two gyant-like images, called Colossi resembling two old men, naked and holding Cornucopia in their hand. It is commonly received, that these were the statues of Saturn and Mars; for that certain it is how their Temples stood hard by: and many evidences there are, besides the very ruins thereof, which testifie so much.

Over-against the hot-houses of Constantine, upon the very brow of the hill, there standeth to be seen one half of a marble tower, which the people dwelling thereby call Mesa. This men think, was the tower of the Sun, by the ornaments there reared and set up by Aurelian: for this Emperor worshipped the Sun above all other gods; and therefore you shall see stamped in his coin this inscription: Soli invicto. To the invincible Sun. His mother also, a Priest of the Sun, thereupon reared a Temple unto the Sun.

In the side of the hill near the foresaid baths are two houses seen standing: the handy-work of Praxiteles and Phidias. These were (by report) Terraces the Kings and translated to Rome.

That part of the Quirinalis which boundeth upon Vallis Martia was called the mount and Temple of Clatva and Apollo.

Not far from thence behind this hill, there is another rising and ascent: where by antique letters it is evident, that the old Capitoll stood together with the chappell of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva.

Over-against these places, enclining toward the right hand, where now standeth the Church of S. Vestalis, Pomponius Atticus dwelt in an house which came to him by inheritance from his grandfather, and was called Pamphilianna. They write, that this was a most sweet and pleasant seat, by reason of a wood near unto it.

In the same place was built afterwards the Temple of Quirinus, kept alwaies shut, to signifie that it was an unknown secret: whether Romulus were entered and lay in the earth, or were translated into the number of the gods in heaven.

There was a porch or walking place there of that name: where folk used commonly to meet, to dispatch businesses and contract marriages.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIII.

The public way or causey called Alta; the house of Sabinus; the street called Alta of Mamurcus; the Court and gardens of Salust, and the field or plain Sceleratus.

The high causey reaching from the baths of Constantine to the gate Quirinalis along the side of Quirinalis was paved with four square stone.

Upon that causey, at a place called the Pomptina, Flavius Sabinus had an house, wherein, by report, Domitian was born.

It is avouched in old time there was a street of Mamurcus: and that his statue there stood where now is S. Susans Church.

Not far from that Church was the Court of Salust, and his most neat and fine hortiards, where the field called Sceleratus lay, and reached near the gate Collina. Of those hortiards, as also of the hamlet Tiburtina, there yet continue some marks and remnants in the bottom of the valley, between the dry hill and the way which bringeth to the gate Salaria. On that little hill is seen the very house of Salust, which the people there inhabiting call Salustrium. Of this matter see more in Cicero and others.

Beyond the hortiards of Salust, near the gate Collina, there is an high place like a mount where in times past the vestall virgins, such as were condemned for incontinency and incest, were buried quick; and thereupon all the plain about it was called Sceleratus, together with the way that leadeth thereto.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Temples of Salus, of Dius, Fidius, of Fortuna Primigenia, of Honor, Hercules, and Quirinus; also the Senate-house of women.

The mount Quirinalis had very many Temples & Chappels, although the certain place where they stood is not so well known at this day, namely, one of Apis. That of Salus was painted by Fabius Piclor, and burnt in the time of Claudius. By Junius Bubulcus Dictator when he triumphed over the Equians it was vowed by him (Censor) but to making, and in his second Dictatorship dedicated.

Salus, Dius, and Fidius, were the Sabins gods, which, when they left their native country and home, with all their other household gods, they carried with them into mount Quirinalis. This god (Fortuna) was in words and name three, in deed and truth but one, as they said. These three therefore had one temple built them upon this hill, and were called by one name, Sanctus. The opinion received of which godhead was such, that an oath was thought to carry a great power of sanctity and holiness, whereby a man in that threefold name and one Deity, avowed and swore thus, Me-Dius Fidius.

Domitiana, a Pretor or Lord Chief Justice within the City of Rome, built a Temple upon that hill to Fortuna Primigenia.

Besides, in that mount were the Temples of Honor and Hercules.

Likewise the Council-House of women was in the mount Quirinalis, at which in former times the wives and dames of the City met yearly upon certain solemn set daies.

Moreover, it is recorded, that the feast Agonalia was celebrated in Quirinalis.

CHAP. XXV.

The Court or Forum Archimonium; the pillar Tiburtina; the house of Martial; the Cirque of Floralia; the Temple of Flora; the shops of Minimus, and the common ascent called Clivus Publicus.

Between the hill Monte Mario (whereof ye may read before in the first book and the chapter next following) and Quirinalis there is a valley four square, but lying somewhat in length. In that part thereof which lieth under the mount of Clivus and Apollon, was the Court called Archimonium. For the very Church of S. Nicholas, which at this day standeth upon that place is named De Archimontis.

Not far from it there is another place, to wit, Pila Tiburtina: There stood the house of Martial, as he himself witnesseth.

Next to it followeth the round Cirque (Floralium) where yearly to the honour of the goddess Flora, the feastival Floralia is celebrated. Now this Flora was a famous curtezan or strumpet at Rome, who having by her whores trade gathered a mighty deal of goods together, in her last will made the people of Rome her heirs, with this condition, That every year they should celebrate the memorial of her birth day. But the Senat thinking this a ridiculous mookery, to honour and dignifie so filthy a thing with such a remembrance, they devised a goddess of flowers, forsooth, called Flora, and her upon those holidays they seemed to please and content, that she would be good to the growth of trees and corn, and that they might do well in their flowering and blooming time. To this goddess we test that a Temple likewise was consecrated: And you meet with the work-houses where they make Minimus, i. e. Vermilion. Near unto which was the Clivus Publicus.

CHAP. XXVI.

The hill Hortulorum, the Temple of the Sun, and the sepulchre of Nero.

THis little hill (Hortulorum) containeth but a few things worth the writing. Among which is the house of Pincius a Senator, who gave the name both to a gate and a mountain, which in these daies are called Mount Pincius, and gate Pinciana.

The reliques and marks of his house are seen in that very place, near the old wall. And about the same walls we meet with an huge building in form of an hemisphere or half circle, which men imagine, was the Temple of the Sun.

Upon the same hill over-against the tomb of Marcellus in the very port way Flaminia, fast by the monument of Domitian stood Nero's sepulchre also;

Now this hill Hortulorum took the name of certain hortyards and gardens under it, which in old time, by reason they were continually so well watered were most fruitfull. Down this hill all they were wont (in times past) to descend into Campus Martius, who meant to see and stand for any Magistracy.

CHAP. I.

Of the flat plot of the City, and the Theatre in generall.

That it may be understood more certainly in what place of the plain and leuell part of the City every thing stood, let there be a streight and right line drawn from the Capitoll, through Pantheon to Tyber, near the Church of S. Roch. So shall the City be in manner divided into two equal parts. The one shall lie from the front and side of the Tyber, the other from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flumentana, along the foot of the two hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum.

Begin we will therefore at the Theatre of Marcellus, and recount the places in order, as hitherto we have done. As for Theatrum, a Greek word it is, and in Latine may be aptly translated Vesperium. The first Theatres were appointed among the Athenians, and those in regard of husbandmen, who on festivall daies visited the Temples of the gods: afterwards, at Rome they began to be taken up. The first, and that the greatest of all others was built of timber by M. Scaurus: for, the concavity within would receive 80000 men. After it, were Theatres made to turn about and shew their front one while this way, another while that. But as touching Theatres, see more in Cassiodorus and Vitruvius, who have written plenteously thereof, and namely, by whom they were first ordained, and in what manner built.

CHAP. II.

The Theatre of Marcellus and the Library: the gallery and court of Octavia.

Augustus built many things under the name of others, as we find written by authors in sundry works. And among the rest was the Theatre of Marcellus his nephew or cousin by his sister Octavia. A part hereof is yet to be seen between the Capitoll and Tyber, where now standeth the palace of the Subelli. It was able to contain 80000 men. See more thereof in Asconius.

Hard by the very same Theatre was the gallery of Octavia, reared by the said Augustus for his sister Octavia's sake. Therein were certain curious pieces of work wrought by Praxiteles, and namely, the ravishing of Proserpina. The portraiture of Bacchus & Satyrus, Also Apollo, Diana, and then nine muses, the workmanship of Timarchides. Within this gallery or walking place, Pliny saith, there stood a chappel of Juno, and the image of the said goddess. Fast by the said gallery stood the court or place of Octavia, and in it Cupid portraied with lightning in his hand. It took up in times past as great a space, as at this day the Churches of S. Nicholas in Carcere, and S. Mary in Porticu.

After the death of Marcellus, Octavia his mother set up a library near his Theatre. Now the first that ever ordained, That books of all learning should be in some publike places bestowed for to be read of all that would come; was at Athens Pisistratus the tyrant, and at Rome Asinius Pollio.

CHAP. III.

The Cirque or show place Flaminius, and the Temple of Apollo.

That this Cirque Flaminius stood in that place where at this day the dark store-houses and cellars be, hard by S. Katharins church, the marks yet remaining testifie. Flaminius it was called, either because it was built about the plain called Campus Flaminius, or else by Flaminius the Col. who was slain at the battell of the lake Thrasymenus. In it were the plaies and games exhibited, which they call Apollinarias; and therein the horse-runnings were performed. To it the Senat used oftentimes to come, down from the Capitoll to sit in councill. Neptuno also had a chappel there.

Apollo's

Apollos Temple was in that very place, as it evidently appeareth, where now S. Maries Church is under the Capitoll, between the herb-market and the Cirque Flaminius, near to the gate Carmentalis.

CHAP. IIII.

The Temples of Vulcan, Mars, Bellona, Hercules, and Jupiter Stator: the column or pillar Bellica: the altar of Neptune: the gallery Corinthia: and the Cloffe of Mars.

Within the Cirque Flaminius stood most famous Temples of the gods, to wit, of Vulcan, Mars, and Bellona, to wit, that which was toward the gate Carmentalis. Before the said gate there stood a marble pillar, which the Romans called Bellica, for it shewed when war was to be made. The Romans in old time used and retained this manner in proclaiming war: The publicke beadle, or one of the heralds called Faciars, lanced a spear with some other ensignes of war, into that labe upon which they meant to levy arms. But when after many conquests they had enlarged their empire and dominion, and that they were oftentimes to give defiance to nations far remote and distant, because they should not need to fling a spear or javelin, as I said before, into that land, they did but stick one in the pillar abovenamed, on that side which regardeth that part whither they were to make their expedition.

To Hercules the Great, prosector and keeper of the cirque Flaminius, they built a Temple in the same place: for his statue was there erected in the very entrance thereof, on that side where now standeth the Church of S. Lucy in the dark Apotheca.

M. Fulvius built another Temple of the allowance that he had of the Censors stock, to Hercules Musarum: for he had heard in Greece how Hercules was Musagetes, i. e. the leader and companion of the Muses. The same Fulvius translated the images of all the Muses out of the town Ambracia to Rome, and consecrated them under the protection and safeguard of that most potent and mighty deity, to the end that they might have mutuall help one of the other: namely, the quietness of Muses by the defence of Hercules; and the valour of Hercules, by the sweet voice of the Muses. This Church much decayed and disfigured by time, Martinus Philippus, Augustus his father in law, i. e. his mothers husband repaired.

In the same Cirque they would have the Temple of Jupiter Stator to stand. There also (as they gather by certain presumptions) was the altar of Neptune, which in old time ran blond.

Octavius reared a porch or gallery built and born up with brazen pillars, and thereupon named Corinthia. This stood between the Cirque and S. Nicholas Church, and was also called Chalcidicum, i. e. brazen or copper.

The Colois or stately of Mars, at the Cirque Flaminius, was in the Temple of Brunus Cullivus.

CHAP. V.

The porch or gallery of Mercury: the Theatre of Octavius: his house, cloister, and gallery: and the Temple of Venus Victresse.

Between the Cirque Flaminius and the Tyber, in the very entry of the Church of S. Angel in Piscina, there is a porch or gallery, consecrated sometime to Mercury, or, as some would have it, to Juno. This being consumed with fire, Es. Septimius Severus reedified. But the porch which standeth in the Jews street called Cenra, they say was builded by the Emperor Severus.

Between the gallery of Marcellus and the mount reared by Hadrian, Pompey was the first that built a Theatre to continue. For all others before were taken down when the games and shews were once done and past: and when need required, new were set up. A great part of this Theatre when Pompey had finished, comes Caligula and made an end of the rest. Afterward, Theodoric K. of the Ostrogoths reedified it. This also received eighty thousand men.

Near unto this Theatre there was a court or stately Hall called Atrium, the same which at this day they name Saturnum; also the house of Pompey. At a porch before it. These edifices of Pompey, at what time as Philip exhibited the stage-plays, were consumed with fire. Near to the same theatre the emperor Claudius of famous memory, reared an arch of marble for memorial of Tiberius Caesar. In the foresaid Theatre (men say) was the Temple of Venus the Victress.

CHAP. VI.

The bains Agrippinz: Pantheon, and the porch thereof: also the Temple of good speech.

From the arch of Pompey, as you go northward, you shall meet with the baths Agrippina, the marks whereof are seen in that place which now of the inhabitants there, is called Cyambella. Now, Agrippina they were named of Agrippa who built them: See Pliny hereof in his discourses of Nature.

Near unto the foresaid bains, there is a Temple of greatest antiquity, and among other old Temples of the city, the noblest of all the rest, which at this day remaineth in manner whole and sound. Because it was dedicated almost to all the gods, they thought good to name it Pantheon. In form it was like the world, representing a sphere or globe. At this day they call it S. Maria the round, of this the temple, Pliny and others have made mention, unto whom I refer the readers. In the very porch and entry of this temple, were the statues of Augustus and Agrippa. The images of Mars and Venus. At the lappet of Venus ear, there hung as a pendant that most costly pearl of Cleopatra. Likewise there stood the image of Minerva, the handy work of Phidias. Moreover, Hercules; at whose statue the Carthaginians in old time pled yearly to sacrifice mankind. They ascended up to this temple as in the rest, by many steps: for men in times past used to rear the temples on high and made but one way to go into them. A porch to this temple Agrippa joined: a piece of work worth all admiration, which of some was called Porticus. For this word Porticus, betokeneth nothing else but an ornament or porch, αὐτὸ τὸ ὄψαλμα, before the door. Herof also have authors written much. This temple first Hadrian the emperor of happy memory, and afterwards Antoninus Pius, redified.

Certain reliques and remanents four angled and somewhat long, of Good-speeds temple, are evidently seen in the streets of Minerva and S. Eusebii. This god was long ago worshipped, that all things might fall out happily in the end. Portraied he was in habit of a poor man, holding in his right hand a charger, and in thaleft an ear of corn.

CHAP. VII.

The baines of Nero and Alexander: the Cirque named Agon.

BEhind S. Eusebii church, between Pantheon and Lombardi-street, the remanents are seen of the baines and vaults of Nero.

Near unto these Alexander built others new (by conveyance of water into them, which they they call Alexandrina) and those very fair and delectable: Wherof Lampridius hath written much.

Near unto them (some think) were the baths of Hadrian: and they would have them to stand in that very place where now is S. Aloisii church.

In the plain part of the City there appear most evident tokens of a long and spacious Cirque, which they call at this day Agon. It took that name either of the games Agonalia instituted by Numa in the honour of Janus, which in that shew place are represented the 9 day of January; or because all manner of such shewes and displays, called by the Greeks Agones, were wont there to be exhibited. Some would have it to be built by Nero or Alexander, upon this reason, that other ornaments of theirs were to be shewed there. For the manner of the Princes and Emperors was, ordinarily to bestow their monuments and memorials in one place.

CHAP. IX.

The temple of Neptune, Terentius: the Altar of Dis or Pluto: the marsh Caprea.

ON the strand of Tybre, where now S. Blasii Church standeth, sometimes Neptunus temple stood. The same was rebuilt by Hadrian. Therein were the painted tables hung, were represented the shipwracks.

Terentius is a place in Mars field, so called, for that in it the altar of Dis was hidden: or because the water of the Tybre running thereby, eat away and wore the banks of that side: or lastly by occasion of Evander, who arrived with a fleet in that place, and there abode. There also in time of the Alban war, they hid the altar of Proserpina under the ground, that they only might have knowledge thereof, where it was.

In the same Mars field (some think) was the fen or marsh Caprea, where Romulus in a tempest which suddenly arose, was taken away. Of which matter Livy writeth.

CHAP. X.

The house Corvina: the broad way or gate: and the temple of Isis.

THe second part of the flat City, reached along the foot of Quirinalis, from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flaminia. In which part near the Capitol, was the house Corvina, built by that name and family, and to this day keepeth still the old name, for commonly called it is Macellum Corvina.

From that house unto the bars or rails in Mars field, extendeth the way Lata, retaining yet the antique name and there standeth the church of S. Maria in the broad way.

In the same way stood sometime by report, the temple of Isis near the rails above-said, where now is the church of S. Marcellus. Now this Isis was a goddess of the Egyptians. She was honoured and worshipped also at Rome, together with Osiris, innamed Serapis: of whom the publick plaies in the quarter Flaminia (from Serapis here the name. It happened in the temple of Isis that incest was committed, whereupon the Emperor Tiberius caused the Priests of that temple to be crucified, & the place it self to be demolished. Other temples of this goddess there were at Rome, for Cicero translated all her sacred rites and ceremonies to Rome, and daily with exceeding great reverence observed the same.

CHAP. XI.

The arch of Camillus: the temple of Minerva: and the swine market.

AS a man goeth down from the broad-gate aforesaid toward the Pantheon, he shall see a most ancient arch. Some think (but untruly) that erected it was for Camillus: for many a fair day after his time, these arches were in no request and use: and therefore it belonged to some other L. Generall. Between this arch and Pantheon, Cn. Pompeius built a temple to Minerva, wherein he comprised in a compendious sum, the memoriall of his acts and exploits. Other ensignes also in the honour of the City of Rome, he there set up, and those he garnished and adorned. Whereof read Pliny.

At the foot of the mount Quirinalis, in the hort-yards and the Columnenses, near to the ascent & rising of the hill which leadeth now into the mount Capitolinus, there was sometime the market-place Swarium, so called of selling of swine there. For Varro witnesseth, that in old time they had certain set and appointed places for the selling of certain things, and thereof the market took the name. Thus of oxen, the market Boarium; of fish, Piscarium, of swine, Swarium; of worts or herbs, Holitorium, was called, &c.

CHAP. XII.

Of the field called Martius, or Tyberinus.

FORasmuch as in the former book it hath been sufficiently declared as touching Mars field, where it lay, it shall be needlesse to make any repetition thereof in this place: but why it was called Martius, would be here in briefe considered. Named so it was, because it was consecrated to Mars: for when the Tarquins were expelled out of their Kingdom, what ground or standing corn they were possessed of, they divided amongst those Citizens who were not landed at all, reserving only this field Martius: which because it was consecrated to Mars, that in it the games and places should be solemnized and the youth exercised, they thought that the fruit also there growing should likewise be counted sacred and accursed, and so deemed it unlawful that any distribution thereof should be made, but threw it all into the Tyber, wherof arose the land called Tyberinus, of which we will speak in the last book. In this field therefore (besides the native beauty of the place and the delectable sight of the meadows) were erected the ornaments and statues of brave & renowned persons: yea, and out of the very Capitoll, when the place began to be pestered and over-straight by reason of so many ornaments which thither were daily brought, many of them were from thence translated into Campus Martius. This field was called of men in old time, Tyberinus, like as Tyber also was named Martius.

CHAP. XIII.

The porch, the temple, Column, and Palace of Antonius Pius: the rails or enclosure, called Ovilis.

BETWEEN the Sciara & Pantheon streets, near to Saint Stephens Church in Trullis, there sheweth a stately porch, which most men suppose was that of Antonius Pius, for that his temple standeth so near. The Column also of Antonius is not far off. This he raised of an exceeding height with winding and turning stairs, like that of Trajanus, wherof we have spoken before. Between this Column and the porch, the said Emperor had (by report) a goodly palace. Between the said Column and the water Virgo, they say, the rails or enclosure within Mars field stood, called Septa. Now this place was enclosed within wooden rails, and strongly fenced with posts on every side, wherein the people of Rome when at the creation and election of magistrates they were to passe their voices were kept close: and for the resemblance of sheep pens, Ovilis of some they were called. By Livy they are set down, near the waies Emilia and Flaminia.

CHAP. XIV.

The hill Citatorum: the Villa Publica, temple of Neptune, and the bridge in Mars field.

BETWEEN Antonius Column and S. Lawrence church in Lucina, there is raised a mount, called now Citorius; for Citatorum; nor it was a mount indeed, but because the people of Rome, when in the choosing of magistrates they were to give their voices, as they were cited, went thither as it were unto some hill. Some say it was called Acceptorum, of taking the peoples suffrages: others Septorium, for the vicinity of those Septa before said. This little mount, there be that would have to rise and increase by the ruin of some porch or Rately gallery: or else of the common Hostelry, called Villa Publica. For there was in times past a place called Villa Publica, a large building in manner of a court or hall, wherein were received and entertained all ambassadors of enemies, who might not be allowed either to enter into the City, or go into the publick lodging or Hospital called Græcostasis.

Near to the Septa, M. Agrippa (as Dionis writeth) built a goodly temple with a most beautiful porch to it, in the honour of Neptune.

At this foresaid hillock called Citatorum, and the Column of Antonius, there was a bridge fast by The Topography of Rome.

by the Septis, whereupon they that were cited, when they had given their voices, passed by and went their waies : and so were levered from the rest that were to give their suffrages, because they should not be entermingled amongst them, nor be able to shew unto them, on whose side they had passed their voices.

In the same Mars field, it is recorded that in times past stood the temple of Pietie, even whereas now the church of S. Savior is.

CHAP. XV.

The water Virgo : the lake and chappel of Iuturna, as also that of Pietie.

THe water Virgo, which retaineth still the pleasant sweetness to the tast in drinking, and keepeth yet the old name, beginneth to gather to an head near the bridg Salarinus, and being carried in a most deep gutter entreth into the City at the gate Collina, and so is raised to the hill Hortulorum : where, by arched work it is conveyed through Mars field, and yeelds all the way to the inhabitants, water for their use ; and endeth at the length in the hortyards of Lucullus.

Moreover in Mars field, there was (as men say) a fountain and well or cistern of Iuturna, sister of K. Tarnus, yeelding most wholesome water. This water-Nymph, they avouch (and that right well) to have been called Iuturna, a juvando, i. of helping ; because she was thought to help the sick. The very place is at this day by a corrupt word, named Lestreglio.

CHAP. XVI.

The arch of Domitian : the obelisk of Mars field : the Amphitheatre of Claudius the Emperor.

THe triumphant arch, so dismembred (as it were) and bereft of all his ornaments, standing between churches of S. Sylvestre and Lawrence in Lucium, and taketh up a peece of the way or street Flaminia, is attributed to Domitian the Emperor. And hereupon besides others presumptions) they appropriate it to him, for this emperor reared many such arches in every place.

The Obelisk also there is in this Mars field, which Augustus transported from Hieropolis a City in Egypt to Rome. Besides the native ensigne and wonderfull hieroglyphick inscriptions which it brought with it of the own, therein to be seen, Augustus adjoined other ornaments no lesse admirable. But hereof it is better to read Pliny.

Claudius the Emperor built near the Septa in Mars field an Amphitheatre, which he decked & adorned with fair statues and most beautiful columns.

CHAP. XVII.

The vale Martia : the palace the porch of Augustus : the Naumachie of Domitian and the temple of the family Flavia.

THe vale Martia taketh the name of Campus Martius : it lyeth between Tybre and the hill Hortulorum : within the which in a place lower then all the rest about it, appear the Naumachies of Domitian, where in old time he exhibited shews of naval fights. In which place before-time likely it is, that Augustus had his Naumachie; which being cleaned and scoured by Domitian, retained afterwards his name. Read Suetonius.

Near to the Naumachie, was the temple (as it is thought) of the kinred Flavia.

In this place, Julius Capitolinus proveth that the porch and palace of Augustus was built.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Mausoleum of Augustus : and the two obelisks near it : also the tomb or sepulchre of Marcellus.

IN the vale Martia, between the way Flaminia and the bank of Tybre, hard by S. Roches church, Augustus made a Mausoleum, to serve for a sepulchre as well to himself and all the Emperors, as also for his whole house and name. This building is like unto a turret standing at the gate called Populi, which sheweth it self spoiled now of all the ornaments that set it out. Men would have it to be the sepulchre of Marcellus. And Augustus, named this sepulchre of his, Mausoleum, for the resemblance it had of that of Mausolus K. of Caria, which Artemisia his wife built for him. Read Cassiodore Strabo, and others thereof.

Close unto the Mausoleum of Augustus, were two obelisks, as the ruinate remnants thereof do testify.

CHAP. XIX.

The way Flaminia : the Trophees of Marius, or her goodly ornaments of the field Martius in general.

CNENS Flaminius the colleague of M. Lepidus, having vanquished the Ligurians, paved the way or street Flaminia. This was led from Placence, through Narnia, Fuliginum, Nucerina, Calium to Fortunes temple, to Pisaurum, and so forward to Ariminum. See Livy and Suetonius.

Between

The Index to T. Livius.

Between the Mausoleum of Augustus, and the hill called Hortulorum, were the Trophæes of Marinus over Ingritha, Trophæes as Varro witnesseth, were so called of σποία Greek word, which signifieth, fight; for that the manner was to hang up the spoils and disrobings of enemies put to fight and slain, upon trunks and posts.

In Mars field, were the sepulchres of Sylla, Hirtius, and Pansa, of Italia, Britannicus, Drausus, the Emperor Claudius, and other right hardy and valiant knights, beside infinit ornaments more, whereof we have written before in this book.

CHAP. I.

Of the river Tybre.

IT should follow by due course and order, to treat of Ianiculum and all that quarter of the City on the other side of Tybra: but because these parts are separate from the rest of the City by the river Tybre between; thereof also it is meet to say somewhat briefly. And first verily the reason of that name should be shewed. Some think therefore, that the river was called Tyberis, ἡ τὴν ὕβριν. For the Sicilians when as in old time they had overcome the Carthaginians in battel, and taken a number of them prisoners, enjoined them, for the better fortification of their own City, to cast a trench about it, and to let water thereinto: and this ditch in reproach of their enemies, they called ὑβρις. And the same men upon a time afterwards, when as they encamped near Rome, gave this very name unto this river also, whereas before it was called Albula. Some think it was named so of Tyberis a King of the Tuscans, slain upon the banks thereof. Varro is of opinion, that it took the name of Tiberinus, a neighbour Princee of the Veientians. In holy writings we read it Tyberinus. In vulgar speech they call it Tyberis: in poetry, Tybris. In old time it was termed Rumen, as it were, gnawing and eating the banks thereof. Also at one side of the City it was named Terentius, as a man would say, wearing the banks. It springeth from the Apennine, above Arno. At the first it is but small and shallow, but before it entreth into Rome, it (having received 40 other rivers) is encreased to such bigness, that ships of burden and the greatest hulks, may come up in it as far as Rome. This river divideth Tuscan from Fimbria, the Sabins countrey and the Latins, entreth at the North part of the City, and so passeth through Southwards, between the gates Hofstensis and Portuensis, leaving Ianiculum on the right hand and the City on the left, and so neer unto Hofstia is discharged into one mean broad stream, and falleth into the Tyrrhene sea. Upon the banks thereof, as if they were consecrate to some divine power, it was not lawfull to set up any building. Certain warders and keepers there were appointed, for the chancell and the banks. But of this river, Pliny and others have left much in writing.

CHAP. II.

Of the bridges built upon Tybre.

THe Tybre, as is abovesaid, being so deep as that it is navigable, and beareth the greatest ships, hath no foord in any place that can be waded through; and therefore necessary it was to make bridges over it, and so to join that part on the farther side of Tybre, to the rest of the City. Hostulius, after he had killed Geryon, built a bridge, where afterwards stood that which they called Sublucius. Also before the foundation of the City, there was a bridge over Tybre, called Sacer; upon which they sacrificed men to Saturn by throwing them down into the river. But when Hercules afterwards had put down that manner of sacrificing, he gave order, that mens images made of reeds and bulrushes (which they called Argæi) should be cast down in stead of them. But after the City was built, there were other bridges made to the number of eight; to wit, Milvius, Elius, Vaticanus, Ianiculensis, Cestius, Fabricius, Palatinus, and Sublucius. And all these, save the Sublucian only, Torillus overthrew.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Milvius.

THe bridge Milvius, which men now call Molvinus, standeth upon the way Flaminia, a mile and more from the City. Built it was in the troublesome times of Sylla, by Scæurus when he was Censor. Many a time they say it was cast down, and as often set up again.

CHAP. IIII.

The bridge Elius, now S. Angel, the Vatican or Triumphal the Ianiculensis or Aurelianus.

THe bridge at this day called S. Angel, in times past Elius, took that name of Elius Hadrianus, for he built that bridge, and neer unto it a sepulchre, which they call Moles Hadriani.
Beneath

Beneath this is another which giveth passage into the mount Vatican and the plain thereof, and thereupon they named it Vaticanus also Triumphalis, for that here it they went up in triumph to the Capitol, to give thanks to Jupiter and rejoice. The piles are yet to be seen in Tyber, over against the spittle or the Capitoll of S. Spirit. The third have the name Lancullensis of Lanculus near unto it, and Aurelianus of the port-way Aurelia, or the gate so called. Antoninus Pius paved it over with marble, and being demolished in the civil wars, was called the broken bridge. After wards Pope Xystus the fourth reedified it, and gave unto it his own name.

CHAP. V.

The bridges Fabertius and Cestius.

Beneath the bridge Aurelius one furlong over against the Theatre of Marcellus, in the very midst of the channell of Tyber, there appeareth a shelf or Island, this was united to the City by the bridge Tarpeius, so called first of the rock Tarpeian near unto it, afterwards Fabertius, of L. Fabertius, who by that bridge conjoined the City and Island together. The same at this day is called the bridge of four heads, taking the name of four marble images with four faces speece, standing at the entry of the bridge, but that bridge which closeth the said Island with the part within Tyber, was called Esquilinus or Cestius in times past, but now S. Bartholmews bridge.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Island Tiberina.

OF this Islands beginning, we have treated before in the description of Mars field, Livy and Dionysius also set down this story at large. It resembleth the form of a Sigum gale, and where it is broadest, it is not above a dart shoot over, in length it containeth about two stadia, or a quarter of a mile. This was in times past called Lycania, and was hallowed to the honour of Esculapius, whose image from out of Epidaurus was thither brought. Of Esculapius and his temple read Pliny.

A temple also of Jupiter standeth in it, dedicated by C. Servilius the Duumvir, which had been vowed by L. Furius six years before the Gauls war.

In the same Island were sick folk presented unto Esculapius (in the field.) And near unto the temple of the said god, was a lazar-house, for that this god was the invanter and maintainer of Physick.

In it also stood the chappell of Faunus, near to the very river, but scarcely remain there any tokens thereof. This Faunus (as men say) was reported to have been the first that consecrated chappels and temples to the gods, and for this cause, all such places consecrated to the gods were called Fana. By the testimony of Cornelius Tacitus and Suetonius the statue of the emperor Julius stood there.

CHAP. VII.

The Senators bridge called also Palatine, and that which is named Sublicius.

Beneath the abovenamed Island, as it were a dart cast off, was the seventh bridge, Senatorum pens, of the Senators, also Palatinus, of the mount Palatine near adjoining, and at this day named it is the bridge of S. Mary in Egypt, by reason of S. Marys church near by.

Now followeth the last bridge Sublicius, and which also is counted the most ancient of all others. This was first made of timber by Aeneas Marcius at the very foot of the Aventine mount, framed only with a floor of planks without any iron spikes and nails or props to shooe against it, so as in times of war and trouble it might be taken in peeces one from another. Now Sublicius it was called a Sublicus, i. great strong posts, but afterwards Emilius Lepidus made it of stone, and thereupon named the marble bridge. Upon it in old time for beggars craving of alms of the passengers: From it also leud and wicked malefactors, were thrown down headlong into Tyber. This bridge as well as other, was often demolished and built up again by one or other.

CHAP. VIII.

Of this side of the City which is beyond Tyber. The City and temple of the Ravenas and Fortis Fortuna: the baths of Severus: the horse-yards of Caesar: the water Alcistina, & the meadow of Marius.

THE region beyond Tyber in old time had the name of Lanculus, the hill which overlooketh and commandeth the greatest part thereof. We find it also called of men in those daies the City of the Ravenas, who with a fleet having aided the Romans, were permitted to dwell in the Lanculus, for fear lest at any time that mountain and hold should be seized and kept by the enemies. Now for as much as this quarter was inhabited by base people, such as followed vile occupations, there were in it but few things worthy of any remembrance. Severus therein built certain baths, Caesar made horse-yards and prepared also a fair pool called the Nemesis for ship-fighting. Also the temple of Fors Fortuna was at (in Tiber Caesar daies) dedicated in that quarter. The water called Alcistina, was derived out of the pools Alcistina, by the high way or claudius.

Claudia into the foresaid Naumachie, and served all those parts. This water was also called by some Augusta. See Frontinus, who hath written much of the Roman waters, Adrianus, who willingly had exposed and offered himself to die for the love of his country, was for that good service endowed by the people of Rome with land on the other side of Tyber. The place at this day is yet called Prata Adriæ. Next unto the Arsenal and ship-decks on the side of Tyber, were the plaies and games of Fishermen in times past celebrated.

CHAP. IX.

The sepulchre of Numa, and Cæcilius the Poet. The Tribunal of Aurelius; the Ianiculum, and the hort-yard of Marcellus.

THAT the sepulchre of King Numa was under the hill Ianiculus a chift of his, with his books long time after digged there, do sufficiently prove. See Levy, Solinus, and others.

The Tribunal Aurelius, and the Arsenal was on that side of the Tyber, as appeareth by those authors.

The hill Ianiculus took the name of Ianus, who there dwelt, & therein was afterwards buried. He also built a town or City there, as they say, so called. This Ianiculus was also called Antipolis as Rome Saturnia.

Commonly also it is received, that Cæcilius the Poet was under the same hill Ianiculus buried. Marialis the Poet, as himself witnesseth in his first book, had most pleasant and delectable hort-yards in the same Ianiculus.

CHAP. X.

The hill and field Vaticane, the temple of Apollo and Mars, the Naumachie, the Cirque hort-yards, and Obelisk of Cæsar.

THE mount Vaticane and the plain thereto, were without the City, in the parts beyond the Tyber, and in that very place, where at this day is the church of S. Peter, and the Popes palace. Called it was Vaticanus, of the god Vaticanus by whose instinct & inspiration it was believed in old time that propheties were delivered. And this god they called Vaticanus for that in power was the beginning of mans voice; for as much as infants, so soon as ever they come into the world, presently pronounce and utter the first syllable of this gods name, i. Va.

Va from hence cometh vagine in Latine.

The temple of Apollo was in Vaticane, in that very place, as men think, whereon at this day is S. Petrus or Petrus church, also another of Mars, wherein standeth S. Marius in Febribus, upon the post way called sometime Triumphalis. Gellius writeth, that Iulius Paulus the Poet had hort-yards in the Vaticane.

The vale Vaticane is there also to be seen, wherein Nero enclosed a compasse of ground like a ring for to ride and break horses in. The conventicles also and wine-taverns there he adorned. Moreover, Nero had hort-yards in that place, which he set forth for divers and sundry punishments and tortures of Christians. All this place thus enclosed, he called the Cirque. Also the pools made for ship-fight, called Naumachie were there, and the Obelisk of Cæsar in the way Triumphalis is yet to be seen standing upright.

CHAP. XI.

The way or street Triumphalis, the water Sabbatina, the sepulchre of Scipio.

OF the Triumphal way, there hath been some mention made before. Called so it was, for that the solemn pomp of triumph used to go that way up into the Capitol. This as well as others was paved with flint stone. It went on still to the back porch of S. Celsus, towards the plain field of Flora; and so forward to the temple sometime of Janus, now S. Angelo, and from thence to S. Gloriosa church in Vilabrum. In the pontifical hort-yards there be many antiquities found, brought thither from other places: and namely, the portraiture and counterfet of Nilus, also of all sorts of creatures living and encreasing there. Likewise of Tyber, with the yeelding her teats to be sucked of the founders of Rome. Apollo with his bow and arrows; the statue of Laocon, whereof hath been spoken before; Cupid hard by Phonix. Many other things before appear in the gallery, and those hort-yards.

The water Sabbatina, was derived to Rome from the Sabbatine pool, called Anguillarie; and afterwards when the conduct and conveyance thereof was by Hadrian restored; it was brought into the palace of S. Peter, to serve the priests there.

In Vaticane plain, not far from the mount reared by Hadrian, there stood a Pyramid or steeple in times past; under which they say P. Scipio Africanus lay entombed.

CHAP. XII.

The mount of Hadrian, and the meadows called Quintia.

Aelius Hadrianus reared a huge and mighty mount for his own sepulchre near the bridge Ælius, over against the Museion of Augustus, in which were bestowed first his own ashes, and afterwards the relics of all the Antonines. This is at this day the fort of the Popes. The same also is called the tower of Crocodinus, because one Crocodinus, a famous captain, held it a long time. See more in Procopius.

The meadows Quinaria in the plain Faisanar, took the name of Quinaria Cincinaria. Read Phily heretofore, Now they be called Aprina.

CHAP. XIII.

Of those things which either have been, or remain now without the gate Flumentana.

THE first thing presented to our sight when we are out of the gate Flumentana is the port-way or causey Flaminia: which, as we have before shewed, was by Co. Flaminius brought as long as far as Ariminum. Within the City he paved it with flint or pebble: without he laid it with gravel. And in that order be all the port-ways laid about Rome. Upon this way Augustus made four bridges, whereof at this day there remain scarcely any tokens. Neer unto the causey Caesar had a farm or manor house, which he called ad Gallinas. The reason of that name Livy sheweth. To the way Flaminia, another named Claudia joined upon which were the Horr-yards of Ovid.

The way Appia, made and paved by Lepidus the colleague of Flaminius, leadeth from Ariminum as far as Bononia. Now two causeies there were of that name, the one which met with Flaminia: the other which Severus laid and made, which went through Pisa and Luna to the Sabatii. In like manner there was a way called Tyberina and Cassia, without the gate now called Veridaria, which passed along time by Suetrium, Tetrella, and Veterulum into the way Vulturna.

Certain places there be in the way Flaminia somewhat hollow and flat like saddles, called therefore Cistella.

Without the gate Collatina there is a causey of the same name.

CHAP. XIII.

Of those things that are reported to have been without the gate Collina.

THE port-way from the gate Collina is called Salaria, because the Sabines at it brought salt into the City. There upon stood the bridge Salaris. And it reached to Numentana. In it was the temple of Venus Erctina, vowed by Fabius the Dictator, and dedicated by L. Porcius. There stood the image of Venus Verticordia, so called, for that she averted mens minds from wanton lust. Likewise the temple of Honor, and an altar in it. Finally, the monument or tomb of Licinius the barber of Augustus.

CHAP. XV.

The things that either were, or at this day are without the gates Numentana and Intraggeres.

WITHOUT the gate Numentana, there beginneth a causey of the same name, by which men go to Numentum. The same is called Figulensis, of the potters furnaces there standing. The goddess Nenia, which was wont to wait & attend upon funerals with dolefull plaints and lamentable moanes, is reported to have had a temple without this gate. In like manner, other gods and goddesses, which are supposed to hurt mankind, they erected temples, but without the gate, because they should do the lesse harm: and namely, to the Fever, to Mars the revenger, to Nemesis and such other. Upon this way Numentana there appeareth a most ancient temple of Bacchus about S. Agnes church, and over the same standeth the bridge Numentana, built by one Narsetes an Epithoth. Between this way and Salaria, was a withdrawing house in the countrey of [Phanotus] Nerva freedman, in which Nerva killed himself. Without the gate Intraggeres, was a tower or castle called Cassidia, where the souldiers of Dioclesian kept a corps de guard. There also is a park called Esvarium (now Esvarium) to be seen, where divers wild beasts were kept, more for pleasure and delight, then profit and use.

namely of ill fortune and sloth.

CHAP. XVI.

Of those things that without the gates Esquilina, Navia, Calimontana, and Gabinia, either have been or now are.

FROM the gate Tiburtina, there goeth a way of the same name leading to the City Tyber. Upon it there is a bridge Mamur, commonly called Mamula and bearing the name of Mamius, Alexander the Emperours mother, who repaired it. A place there is by it called Piscicola, of a multitude of pits there. Also the bridge Lavennus, without the said gate standeth over the river Atia. And without the same gate the two rivers called Anio the old and new do gather a current and unto Rome.

Without the gate Esquilina are waies Lutetiana and Præstina. In this way the water Appia hath his head and beginneth, which by Appius Claudius was brought into the City.

The water Kerge likewise, which in time past was shewed by a maid to the souldiers, is the way, and from thence is conveyed to the City.

But the Roman waters (see Frontinus, who describeth right excellently, the source and beginning the conveyance and carriage, the end also and use of every one of them.

At the end of the way Calimontana, beginneth another called Campana, which closeth with Lutetia, the Between the gate Calimontana and Lutetia, standeth the gate Gabinia. From which there went away some time called Gabina, leading to Gabii (but it runneth soon into Transfina for that the Gabians dwell upon it.

CHAP. XVII.

Of those things which were or are without the gates Latina and Capena.

THE gate Latina gave both name and beginning to the caufey Latina, which through Levianum, now called Val-montium, and Latium reacheth to Campania. In which there stood in old time, the temple of Veneris-fortuna, and the image of the same goddess. Of which writeth Plinius Major. In the said way the water Tepala gathereth to an head and current: From the gate Appia, beginneth a caufey of that name, paved by Ap. Claudius as far as to Capua, whereof speaketh Sirabo.

At the gate Capena, was the temple of Mars the warrior or Grandvour, and therein the sculpture of Mars. Hard by the same temple was the stone Manalis brought into the City of Rome in time of a drought, and presently there arose a shew of rain; whereupon he was called Manalis. In the way Capena, stood the oratory or chappell of Dea-bona and near to it, they say, that Clodius and Papirius were slain. Neer to the gate Capena, was the altar of Apollis, the sacred grove of Honour, and the temples of Hops and Minerva. Like wise of Tropeus, built by Minervius. Moreover, another of Ridiculum: because Annibal having there encamped, was enforced to depart from thence mocked and scorned. Upon the way Appia was the bridge Valentinus, built by the Emperor Valens, and thereupon, neer the hill Maffica, standeth the town Sinnessa. This way had certain notable sepulchres, namely of Collatinus, the Scipios, the Servilii, Metelli, Tullii, of Ennius, Pompeius, the Horatii, and other. And in that part is to be seen the plain, whereupon the Horatii fought that famous combat to the utterance. In it also there is a water and well-spring, consecrated to Mercurio. To it upon a time when the people of Rome ran, every man dipped therein his branch of laurell, and therewith besprinkled them that were next, with an invocation to Mercurio; that as many as had this aspersion and sprinkling, might be absolved of their sinnes, and of perjurie especially. The grove also of Egeria was this gate. The way Appia fell into Appia: wherein S. Sebastiano (by report) suffered even in the very place where they used to solemnize the feast Terminalia, to the god of Meers and Bounds Terminus.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of those things that be without the gate Hostiensis, and others in generall.

FROM the gate Hostiensis beginneth the way Hostiensis which leadeth to Hostia, built by Annius. This was called in old time, the gate of the three twins brethren, or Trigeminorum and without it, Livy setteth the purse or merchant's hall, Emporium.

In that part of the City on the other side of the water, were three gates, Portuensis, Aurelia, Fontinalis. At Portuensis, beginneth away of that name, and leadeth to the port town Offia where there was a temple of Portunus, the god of havens: and wherein the feast Portunalia was celebrated to the honour of that god.

From the gate Aurelia, the way also Aurelia taketh beginning; which along the sea-coast of Thuscia, leadeth to Pisa. The same was called Trajana of Trajanus who repaired it: wherein were the hott-yards of Galba the Emperor; and there also was his sepulchre.

[At the gate Fontinalis, was the feast Fontinalis celebrated at Rome, namely to the goddess of Fountains, as saith Sext. Pompeius.]

To the Reader.

Or as much as Titus Livius is prolix and full of variety: and howsoever otherwise willing enough to speak our language, yet most loth to forbear and forget certain Roman words wherewith so long time he had been acquainted: also for that he then be teach one in his English tongue and in his French and Italian another; whereby he may be thought rather to wish to have forgotten himself, and the fault imparted to his readers: with these regards (as I thought) allowed that much for their sake and converse with English Livy, as to suffice them in this behalf. I thought therefore I have digested: the one dwelling and leading readily to the most ancient and principal matters contained in the whole body of the History: the other expounding the foregoing may serve as first strange to the most: and with all striving to have and show the reason of a purposeful disagreement, hoping that as use will make them more familiar in those strange phrases, so they will confer with him in the primitive Latine (the only touchstone of his true speech) shall excuse and acquit me of just blame, who have endeavored that he might deliver his mind in English, if not so frequently by many degrees, yet as truly as in Latine.

Containing the exposition of those terms in Livy which are not yet familiar in English, and of some places omitted in the Marginal notes.

Whereunto the Reader may have recourse, when he meeteth with any such difficulty in the History.

A ediles, the surname to divers families in Rome: certain inferior magistrates in Rome: who were of two sorts: Plæbii and Censures Plæbii of the Commons only, two in number more ancient, then the other, chosen by the people alone to second and to assist the Tribunes of the Commons in their right hands. This name they took of the charge they had of temples, chapels, and oratories: also they registered the Sanctions and acts of the people called Plæbiscita and kept the same in their own custody: and were clerks of the market: also they exhibited the games and plays called Plæbii. Censures were likewise chosen out of the order and degree of the Patricii so called of the ivory chair wherein they were allowed to sit, as officers of greater state. They set forth the great solemnities called Ludi magni, or Romani: were overseers of the buildings throughout the City as well publick as privat: in manner of the Magistri in Athenis: they had regard to the Publick vaults, fikes, conveyances, and conduits of the City waters: looked to the Arsenal &c. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great persons; and were charged to see unto the provision of corn and victuals. At the first, none but Patricii might be advanced to this place: but in procees of time, Commoners also attained thereunto. These as well as the Plæbii were Sacrosancti, unviolable.

Erarii, they were, who being citizens of Rome, were by the Censors deprived of giving their voices in their Century or Tribe: paid all tribute with citizens according to the valuation of their goods: and served in the wars of their own charges: and either became pendebant, or, arant merchant. It seemeth they took that name.

Agmen quadratum: Agmine quadrato ductus is taken in a three-fold fence. First, The same that infesta exercitus infesto agmine Or, infesta signa: which signifieth the ordinary manner of enemies marching with banners displayed, either to a battail, or to the siege and assault of a fort: and this manner of pike addeeth a grace only to the sentence. Secondly, To march or fight in a four square battailon, though not alwaies with equal sides & right angles: and the same not charged with the carriages at all. Thirdly, When an army is spread and displayed at large, enclosing the impediments or baggage in the midst for safety and security.

Agria, were laws preferred by the Tribunes of the Commons, as well for division of lands (conquered from the enemies) among the Commons: as to restrain the possessions of the Nobles within a certain and compass.

Ambitus. The inordinat and excessive desire to be in office of state, appearing by indirect and unlawful means: either to their friends and kinsfolks, or to the people: against which, many laws in Rome were provided: namely, Acilia, Bibia, Emilia, Lucina and others.

Ancilia. Ancile was a buckler or scutcheon that (as they say) fell from heaven into the hands of Numa in time of a plague: and he being advertised by Egeria, That it was for the health of the City, and ought to be kept safe: caused it more to be made unto it, to like, as they could not be known from the pattern: which hereby was preserved. The keeping hereof was committed to the twelve Salii.

Annales, were brief memorials, Chronicles, or commentaries, containing the names of consuls every year, the date of times, and all memorable occurrents happening therein. The high Priests, called Pontifices maximi had the charge by their place to gather the same into tables, and to set them up in their houses for to be seen: and hereupon they were called Annales maximi, & Maximus Pontificibus: and not of their greatness, as those huge volumes, named Libri Elephantini.

App. Appius, a forename appropriate to the House of the Claudian in Rome.

Appia via. A notable street or high way, begun by Ap. Claudius, reaching from Rome, as far as Capua: and afterwards by Julius Caesar and Trajan. It was extended to Brindis in Chilabria. Of all other it seemeth to be the principal, by the testimony of Papinius the Poet, who writeth thus of it: Appia conitum ferunt Regia viarum. Called it was Triumphalis (as also the gate Capuana) because through it the triumphs ordinarily passed at the said gate.

Ara maxima. The great altar reared by Hercules, and took the name of a great heap of stones about it.

Arbor infelix, Is commonly taken for a tree that naturally beareth no fruit.

Argilina imus, Is the base or low part of a street in Rome: in regard of the upper end thereof, called Summus: in like sort as Janus summus & imus.

Area, is taken for some void place, whereupon nothing groweth. quia are: as Forum boarium in Rome. Area qua posito de bovum nomen habet, and differeth from Campus, for that it is less. Also a plot of ground made level and clean for to build upon: as in Suetonius 26. Forum Caesar de manibus inchoavit, the Area whereof, (i.e. the trimming and levelling of the plot) cost H.S. milies, i.e. 100 millions of Sesterii. Last of all, the broad yards before temples, not covered but compassed about with columns, like a cloister with an altar in the mids, be called Area.

Aruspices, were wisards or south-sayers, directed by the bowels and inwards of beasts killed for sacrifice, called also Extispices, and in Greek εἰρηστροι, who prying into them, had especial regard of the liver: whereupon their whole Art and learning was termed haroskopia, albeit they observed also the heart, lungs, spleen, and kidneys.

Asper. Aspis, usually in Livy is taken for a Roman poise, or coin in brass, the tenth part in value of their silver Denarius. At first it was a pound weight of twelve ounces: but afterwards, the Sextans, i.e. the six part thereof, was valued worth the whole: and howsoever otherwise it altered in poise, it went alwaies for 3 farthings or thereabout of our english money.

Augurium. See Auspicia.

Aurei Romani, Peeeces of gold coin current in Rome: in round reckoning equivalent to our spur-roial of 15 sh. For 100 Sesterii made aureum, which amount to 15 sh. 7 d. ob. the 4 part of mina, i.e. a lib. in silver, and of an ounce of angel gold.

Auspicia: Auspices were properly the observation of the birds, either by their singing and flying in the air: or by their gesture and manner of feeding in their cavea or coop: whereby their Augurs & Pollatii knew in their learning, the pleasure and will of the gods, whether they favoured their enterprises or no. The birds that gave sign by their voice and singing they called Osines quasi ore canentes, as the crow, raven, and owl: and thereof came Augurium, quasi avium garrulus. Those that shewed ought by their flight & wings, were named Alites or Prophetes, as the buzzard, eagle, crane, grype, swan, and broad-winged fowls. varus heryes. The good signs were called Sinistra auspicia quasi sinistra, quod sinant feri, whether they came from the left hand or the right. In pullets or chickens kept in cages, they observed whether they came forth willingly, to their meat (for to abstain from it was thought unlucky) whereas their feeding heartily, was a good sign, and called solistimum tripudium, quasi terripavium & terrepadium. when some of the meat fallerth out of the mouth, & serram pavis, i.e. beateth upon the ground: as it must needs do, when they pecked either corn, or gobbets called offa.

Calve, were certain wars-like engines for to send out and level mighty stones, to batter and shake City walls, made with ropes of sinews and womens hair especially twined together: as appeareth by Penus Calva at Rome, unto whom, by occasion that the women of the City parted with their hair for that purpose, a Temple was dedicated. According to the weight of stones or bullets that this engine would carry, they were called Centenaria, or Talenaria balista.

Basilica, were stately edifices or halls at Rome: at first serving to plead in under cover, wherein they differed from Pora: and also to minister justice, of basilica, which signifieth a Judge, as well as a King: but afterwards they used to meet there in consultation; also to negotiate and transact: and these had not only benches and bars like law-courts, but shops also for the better sort of wares and merchandise.

Bellona, The goddess of war, whose temple stood before the gate Carmenalis, and neer adjoining therunto was a column named Bellica: from which the Romans were wont to lance a dart or javelin towards those parts where they intended to make war: whereas in former times they sent their heralds to the very confines of their enemies, to perform that ceremony.

Bigati, were the Roman Denarii, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with two horses, called Biga.

Boatarche, The chief magistrates of the Boetians.

C. Calus, } The forenames of sundry families in Rome.

Calends, was among the Romans, the day of the new Moon, which fell out with them ordinarily the first of every month: so named in ruy xardin, i.e. a delando, because the petty Pontify used then to call the people to the court Calabra, and there to pronounce unto them how many daies were to the Nones of each month, &c.

Candidati, were they that stood in election and sued for dignities of magistracy: during which time, they wore whiter and brighter gowns than ordinary, that they might be the more easily seen and discerned a far off among others.

Cataphracts, as well horse as foot, were they that were armed at all peeces with compleat harness: and such horsemen were named Defensores.

Catapules, were engines of war to shoot arrows or such like offensive weapons, far off: and by that name was called not only the instrument it self, but the arrow or whatsoever was

Censors, Magistrates of State in Rome: whose charge was to value and estimate mens goods, and enrol them accordingly in their several ranges. Also to demise unto certain Farmers: called Publicans, the publick propries of the City for a rent: and so put forth the City works unto them, to be undertaken at a price. Likewise to oversee mens manners, whereby oftentimes they would deprive Senators of their dignity, take from gentlemen their horses of service and their rings: displace Commoners out of their own tribe, disable them for giving voices, and make them Erarii.

Centuries, were ranges and degrees of men according to their worth, as they were assessed and enrolled by the Censors.

Centuriata comitia, were those assemblies and elections, wherein the people of Rome gave their voices and suffrages, according to their behaviour & wealth, by Centuries. And such were at all times most favourable to the nobles.

Circenses ludii (as one would say) Circen-enses.
For in the beginning before the great lists and shew-places (called Cirques) were built, the plot of ground wherein were performed the horle-runnings and other masteries, was flanked of the one side with the river, and environed on the other with swords. Vide Tur- neb. Adversar. lib. 3. cap. 5.

Cistophorus, A peece of silver coin in Greece and those parts neerer adjoining, less than Drach- ma or Denarius: so called of the stamp, representing a man carrying a panier or casket with holy reliques, in Cybeles mysteriis, in Bacchi orgiis or Cereriis initiis. If it be true, that 7500 of them go to the Enboick talent, which containeth 4000 Denarii, it is just our groat sterling: but if Denarius have propor- tionem sesquiquartam to it, and that 4 Denarii are 5 cistophori, (as Glarean collecteth out of Budam), it cometh to our pence of 6 pence.

Claustra, supposed to be the image of Venus, found by K. Tatius in the great vault or sink conveighed under the city, called Claustra maxima. And for that it was not known what goddess it resembled, he gave it the name of that place. Others say, it is written Claustra, of the old word Clua (to fight: for that the Romans and Sabins, ready to strike a battail) were by means of myrtle branches consecrated unto Venus, pacified and reconciled, in that very place where afterwards the said goddess was by that name worshipped.

Comptionalis senex, Paulus Manutius upon the familiar Epistles of Cicero, giveth this attribute to Scapulus in the end of the third book of Livy, wherein in all editions it is, Concor- patio. Now these Comptionalis senes (saith he) were those old men, in whose tuition and authority, men by their last will and restament left their widows or daughters: and without whom they might not pass in De- mutuum iuramentum per coemptionem, i. he was married according to the ceremony called Co- emption, whereby the husband and wife seemed to buy one another.

Cohors, was ordinarily a band of 500 soldiers;
although once or twice in Livy we read of Quadragesaria cohortes.

Comitium, was a publick place or Hall within the Forum Romanum, where the people used to assemble for audience of justice, pleading of causes, and other occasions: whereupon Comitiales dies, were such daies upon the which they might so assemble and meet together.

Comitia, or Comices, were the solemn assemblies of the people at Rome, summoned by the magistrats lawfully: to choose officers, to enact new laws or cancel old, by their voices: wher-of were three sorts.

Curia, instituted by Romulus, Centuriata, by S.
Tullius, Tributa, brought in by the Tribuns of the people: and the first author thereof was P. Volus.

Curia and Centuriata, were Auspiciata, i. performed with the solemnity of observing the approbation of the birds, and the Senators.

Tributa, were held by the Commons only, pene- quos non erant auspicia, and required neither Auspicia nor authoritatem, i. the allowance of the Patres. And as in Comitiis Centuriatis, the richer and greater men had the vantage: so in Curia and Tributa, the poorer sort (for their number) went away with the better.

In the Curia comitia, at the first (until S. Tul- lius his reign) passed the election of KK, and other magistrats, judgements in capital matters, and laws. But in later times, they served only for two laws: i. de imperio, or de re mi- litarium: in which the consul or others (chosen to their magistracy in Centuriatis co- mitiis) had authority of command in the army: the other, de adoptione: and these laws were called Curia.

In the Centuriata comitia, from the time of Ser- Tullius, passed the elections of consuls, De- cemvirs, Tribuns consular, Censors, Pretors, and such greater magistrats: and confirmed they were by Curia. Also, judgment of capital matters, & the laws named Centuriata.
In this, there was one centurie drawn forth by lot out of all the rest, to give their voices first, and that was called Prærogativa. After which were called to their suffrages, the Centuries of the first and second Class, and they were named Primo-vocata: the rest which followed, were called Tercio-vocata.

Tributa, served for the creation of Tribuns, Æ- diles of the Commons, and other inferior magistrats. Also the laws as touching peace, or enfranchising allies, judgments penal and fines, and those ordinances concerning the good of the Commons, called Plæbiscita.

Some have thought amils, and Curia and Tri- buta comitia, were both one: but Curia were more ancient, and of greater state as being

being Auspices, and ex auctoritate Patrum. Herein only they agreed together and differed from the Centuriata, that in delivering their voices, the Tribes and Curia were intermingled: whereas the Centuries were sorted and gave their voice according to their degree, age, and ability in the Censors book.

Congius, or Chus, A measure among the Romans containing 6 Sexarii, and every Sexarius about 20 ounces: so that Congius receiveth X. librales mensuras; as appeareth by the old pourtrait thereof in brass, with these two characters, X.P. i. ten pound. Whereby in round reckoning it may go for our wine gallon or somewhat better. And for that great persons were wont at first to give dole unto the common people, of wine or oil by the Congii; all other donatives and largesses of that kind, were afterwards called Congiarum.

Consul, one of the sovereign yearly magistrates in Rome, succeeding in the place of KK, so named, a Consulendo either of asking counsel of the people and Senate in State matters, and withal giving his own advice, and providing for the good of the weal-publick: or else, of judging, for so Consulere signifieth: as when we say boni consules. And Livy saith, that Prætores, Consules, and Judices, may be taken one for another. Two of them were usually chosen every year, as appeareth by the law of the 12 Tables: Regio imperio duo sunt: iique præcundo, Judicando Consulendo, Prætores, Judices, Consules, appellator, &c.

Corona, hath diverse significations in Livy. Corona urbem cingere, i. to invest a City round about with armed men, and to give the assault from all parts at once. Sub corona vendere servos, i. to sell slaves in open market, either having garlands on their heads, as the manner was; or environed about with a guard of souldiers, which also is called Corona militum. Sundry garlands or chaplets there were moreover, called Corona, wherewith souldiers were rewarded by their captains, or they honored by their souldiers; (besides those that were presented to Generals by their friends and well-willers, or offered to the honour of the gods:) as Obsequialis or Graminea, which was a wreath of a caich grass called Gramen, given to him that delivered an army from streight sieges, and was by the whole army bestowed upon that savior. Civica, made of oke branches, for him that in battel saved the life of his fellow citizen. Muralis, resembled the battlements of walls: which he received of his captain, that first scaled the walls and mounted over, in the assault of cities. Castrensis, in form of a palliade or rampier made with pales or strong stakes: the honor of him who first entred the enemies camp. Navalis or Rostrata, pourtraied with the stems or beak heads of ships, called Rostra: his reward that first boarded the enemies ship, and gave the first means of a naval victory: These were the principal. For, others there were not so ordinary, as namely, Exploratoria garbished and set out with the sun, moon, and other

Rare: bestowed upon them that did special service in espial and discovery of the enemies quarters.

Curia, were parishes in Rome, 30 in number, instituted by Romulus. Certain halls besides, appointed for assemblies and convocations about Church matters and Religion: whereof some were old, called simply Veteres; others new, named Nova. As for Curia Hostilia, it was the ordinary ancient place of publick counsel within Rome.

Curio, the Priest belonging to each Curia or parish aforesaid: and Curio Maximus, the chief superintendent over them all.

D. Decius, a forename: for Decius, although it were the gentile name of a house, grew afterwards to be a forename, as Paulus: and likewise forenames at the first, came to name families, as Posthumus.

D. Decimus, a forename likewise, as of that Brutus surnamed Albinus, who killed Caesar.

Decemviri, were magistrates, officers, or fellowships, ten in number.

Decemviri legibus scribendis, were ten men chosen to make laws in Rome: who afterwards usurped the sovereign authority, and tyrannized.

Decemviri sacrorum, were certain Priests, who had the keeping and perusing of Sibyls books of destinies, and thereout gave order for sacrifices and expiation of prodigies.

Decemviri: ten Judges or ministers of Justice, selected out of the great court or council of the 100 Centumvirs, and they were called, Decemviri de litibus judicandis: assistant they were to the Pretor or L. chief justice.

Dictator, a sovereign magistrat above all others in Rome, from whom no appeal was granted, mere absolute and King-like: but that his time of rule was limited within six months ordinarily: so named, either because he only said the word and it was done, or because he was Dictus, i. nominated only by one of the Consuls, and not otherwise chosen, usually in some time of great danger of the state. He was called also Pretor Maximus: and namely, when he was made for the ceremony of striking up or driving a nail: also Magister Populi, as Cicero 3 de fin. Moreover, he was sometimes appointed to ordain and hold solemn feasts, in regard that it had rained stones.

Duumviri, magistrates two in number, of divers sorts.

Duumviri capitales, judges to sit upon life and death: from whom it was lawfull to appeal to the people.

Duumviri sacrorum, out of the Patrijans, ordained for dedication of temple, preparing the sacred beds for the gods, called Laesterna; and for the books of Sibylla: these afterwards were increased to five, and so to ten. See Decemviri.

Duum-

The second Index.

Ianus is a God in Rome, sometime represented Effrons with two faces, signifying the time passed, and that to come: otherwiles Quadrifrons, & betokeneth the four times of the year: having in his right hand a character resembling 300, in the left another, shewing threecore and five, according to the daies of the year. But in the plural number Iani, betoken certain hills or great four-square buildings, with four prospects and cros thoroughfares, whereof were divers in Rome.

Ides, Eight daies in every month: of an old word Idus, to divide: for that they commonly fall about the midde of the month, namely, upon the thirteenth or fifteenth daies, according to Horace, Idus illi sunt agenda, quibus mensis Veneris mensura, audit Aprilis.

Interdicted of water and fire, were they who for some crime were banished. Which judgement, although it was not by expresse sentence pronounced, yet by giving order, that no man should receive such an one into his house, but deny him fire and water (the two necessary elements of life) he was condemned (as it were) to a civil death: and this was called Exilium. But voluntary exile was, when a man to avoid the payment of a grievous fine, or imprisonment, went out of the way of his own accord, and left his native country.

Ingerum, which commonly I translate Acre, signifieth among the Romans, to bein measuring of land the Agri, ground, and foundation of all other measures in that kind: like as, the As or Assis, of weights: of which it borroweth the terms in sub-division and multiplication, whereof the least is Semissagium. Now is the Scrutulum in land measure fifteen foot square, according to which, it may soon be gathered, how much Ingerum containeth, considering it hath that name, a drobum altibus: by which reckoning it beareth 28800 foot of ground within the square. But for that, others think that Ingerum is as much as uno iugo bovum duo diebus rari possit, one daies work of a yoke or team of oxen: for want of another fitter word (except I would call it a journey) I have expressed it by our familiar term of an acre, which is not much under or over a daies work in plowing of oxen here in England.

Interregnum, or Interregium, is properly the time between the former King deceased, and the creation of a new: and he that ruled in the mean space, was called Interrex, which terms continued afterwards in the free state when there were no kings. In the case of vacancy of head-magistrats.

H-S. This Character compounded of two capital I, and the letter S, thus coupled together, is Sestertius, that is to say, a silver coin among the Romans, consisting of two Assi and an half, and thereupon it hath the name Sestertius, as a man would say, Semis tertius, i.

two, and half the third: and therefore you see the numeral note of two, and S, for semis, which is half. It is the fourth part of the Roman Denarius, and in value among us is three half pence farthing one. But Sestertium in the neuter gender, betokeneth as much as millie Sesterties, i. a thousand Sestertes: so that decem Sestertia signifieth ten thousand Sestertia, and decem Sestertia is as much: for you must in this manner of speech understand millia for the regimen of the Genitive case. But if you add unto Sestertium the numeral adverb, it sheweth the same Sestertium in the neuter above said, multiplied a hundred times so much as the said numeral beareth. For example, decies Sestertium, is decem Sestertia, a hundred times told, and as much to say as decies centena millia Sestertia, which is a million of Sestertes: is the primitive signification: whereby a man may soon reckon how much is millie Sestertia and the rest, either under or over decies. The same is to be said of Nummi and Nummi, for it is the same that Sestertium and Sestertium. Moreover, decies, millies, and such like adverbs, whether you put Nummi or Sestertium thereto, or no, is all one: so that by this form of speaking, quo bona fuerunt decies, is meant, thus, his goods amounted unto two millions of Sesterte peeces. Thus much for Idus and other Idolatrias and waters in prose: for I am not ignorant that Poets for the versifiable condition thereof, have many daies, and put Idus for Sestertia, as Georgius Agricola hath well observed.

Lupus, Lupus, Lupus were these called Lupus among the Indigenae, because they need nothing, of quadrupes agens, conveying among the Gods: having been sometimes men of by reason that they might not Indigenae, i. be named, or rather for that they were easy to be entreated and last of all, in loco desertis Illis propiti, the tutel gods and protectors of this or that place: which I rather encline unto.

Insitium, was the way of civil jurisdiction and plea for the time, upon some fault in troubles, as Tumultus Insitium. Which vacation, if we will be somewhat bold, may be called not untruly a lawless, as Insitium the sun-need.

K Kalends. The forename of many Roman.

L Lupus. The forename of many Roman.

Latina Idus. Certain holidays Conceptionis, appointed by the Priest or Magistrats, as occasion required, and after feasts. The solemnity was published and held by the Roman Consul newly created, upon the mount Latina to Iupiter Latina and a sacrifice was there there offered which they call Lævas, for the health of the Latine people: at which, the manner was to give a dole of flesh called Visceratio to the Latine States.

Lectisternia is in some sort declared in the first and two and twenty books of T. Livius, and as much to say, as the solemn ceremony of trimming and setting out a bed, not for repose but repast, according to the ancient manner: wherein they laid the images of their gods, reared upon bolsters and pillows: the principal whereof was that in the honour of Jupiter at the Epulum Jovis, whereupon Jupiter was laid, Juno and Minerva sitting of either side by him.

Lectum is usually to be understood in Livy for the bed whereupon they laid themselves at ease when they took their recreation, and Triclinium is taken for Conclave, i. the parlor where they were wont to sup, because the usual manner was to set three such beds or pallets together: (whereof the room had the name) and a table raised somewhat higher from the floor, and placed so, as it served all three pallets, and was open at one side for the servants to come unto it, and either set meat thereupon, or to minister what was called for. Upon each of these beds therefate or leaned ordinarily three persons: so as nine was the full number of guests at the board, according to the rule, No fewer than the grapes, nor more than the muses. For Horace in this verse, Sæpe trihus lectis videtur conare quatuor, seemeth to glance at the nigardie of that would rather want meat than guests, and to set twelve at the table which was but for nine, whereby also they were pent up together too streight.

Ligati are usually taken for Embassadors sent from one Prince or State to another. Also for Lieutenants in an army, having the charge of a legion under the General, and in his absence, the charge and command of all, who likewise were sent as Nuncios or messengers of credence from the Generals in the field, to make true report unto the Senat, of the success of their affairs. Moreover, they are oftentimes put for deputed delegates, or commissioners assent to the Col. or L. General, in matters of state: having their principal directions from the Senat, but commission to deal in the particulars after their own discretion; much like to those that be called Legati à latere.

Libitina, the goddess of funerals; and after a sort, the superintendent over sepulchres: supposed to be Ænus Epitaphia. In whose Temple were all things to be sold necessary for the interring and burial of the dead. Whereupon they also who were employed to carry forth and bury corpses, were called Libitinarii, as well as Palliones; in Greek νεκροφοροι, and ταφιασται. It is put for death in Horace, when he saith, Non equivo morari, penamque potius, Vitis Libitinæ; and in Livy, as well for the ministers as furniture to sepulchres belonging. The Chappel to this goddess stood without the City, and a gate there was Libitinensis, at which they carried forth their dead. For at Rome they might not commonly bury or burn a dead corps within the City, unless it were upon a special privilege: and the law of 12 tables provided therefore in these express words, In urbe non sepelito neve urito: but in some barren part of their land, each man bestowed the ashes or bodies of their dead. The practise whereof is evident by many examples in histories; and at this day are monuments standing of their tombs reared near the great causey Appia, and elsewhere about Rome. The consideration hereof, with some other circumstances of a place in the 3 book of Livy, gave me occasion haply to translate amiss. These happened to be a great mortality in Rome and the territory about it, not only of men but of cattle also: at what time as the Volscians and Æquians were encamped within three miles of Rome, with a purpose to give the assault to the City; but they were suddenly stricken with a fear that they durst not approach neer, scilicet aque procul visâ atque imminentes tumuli avertere mentem eorum, &c. where I have englished imminentes tumuli, tombs & graves neer at hand, in opposition of scilicet visâ [Romani] procul visâ: and the rather, because it presently followeth, *In desertis agris inter tabernaculorum atque hominum, when tumuli may wel be put for tombs and monuments; and [imminentes] neer at hand: as Livy and others do take those words. But if any man would have it met rather of the 7 hills of Rome commanding and overlooking those houses aforesaid, I will not be against it, but rather my sursum spectantem shall go with him: and pardon me I hope he will, if either there or elsewhere I have seemed to nod and take a little nap, Namque opore in longo sæc. obdormere somnum: seeing that I have taken my self in the manner, and not slept untill my neighbour awaked me.*

Lictors, in Livy are ministers or servants attending upon the magistrats of Rome; namely, Dictators, Consuls, Pretors: for those only were called sometime magistrats, as Scævola, as superior to the rest: so called (as Festus thinketh) quod fasces virgarum ligatos ferant, for that they carried rods tied up in bundles; which rods were of birch, willow, hazell, or the Carpine-tree, [a kind of Plane or Maple] and within them truck an axe, all to signify whipping and death. These officers made way before those magistrats, and were ministers also of the execution.

Livus was the August staff, much like a bishop's crozier, crooked at the end.

Magister Equitum, Master or general of the horsemen. This was an office or dignity among the Romans, incorporate as it were in the Dictator's office, who ever had the absolute naming and choosing of him: and ordinarily himself he was subject to him, howsoever Minimus was by strong hand and a violent course of the people made equal to Q. Fabius his Dictator. Commander he was under him of the Cavalry: and his Lieutenant-general and coadjutor with him in all executions. The same that Tribunus celerum in the time of the K.K.

Manus. The forenames of certain Romans.

Manipulus, in an army, was at the first a petty company of ten soldiers following one leader having a wisp of herbs or hay fastened to the upper end, as a man would say, an handful of men: used after, for a small band or detachment of soldiers: and Manipulares were they termed, who served in one such Manipulus.

Maenia, otherwise called Lencuba or Isis, the daughter of Cadmus. Into her temple, at the time of her solemn feast, might no maid servant enter: and if any did, they were sure to be beaten forth by the dames or wives there assembled: in remembrance of one Amigera, the chamber-maid of Isis, with whom her husband Abraham at the thought, was more familiar than she liked well of.

Majestas, were titles or games at Rome, not (as the later seemeth to import) Majus, which were Romanis, but in the honour of Cybele the goddess, named also Jede, Magna Mater, the great mother of the gods.

Milia, were a measure of silver, was no doubt, a fine of brass money set upon a mans head, after the weight of 1000 such every As weighing 1 lb. of 12 ounces. For before that silver was in use it stamped for coin, As grave placuisse ad gratiam convehant (as Levy saith) when they paid tribute or money to the City Chamber: as they were assessed.

Mulieris, the Elegancy of Women, Nam quæm decorat Græci nomine ornamenta appellavit, cum non per se delectant, sed gratia mulieris, the World. Phæ first book fourth chapter.

Morosa or Mortua, one of the names attributed to Proserpina, græci mortuam non morere sed faceret hominem morcidum, a mortal delusion & malis volens: contrary to that other goddess Proserpina, que ad ædendū excharit. And hereupon it is that Morosa is put for the goddess of sloth and liness.

N Numerus, a forename to some houses of Rome.

Nova tabula, was an enactment proposed in favour of debtors at Rome, whereby the old debt-books and obligations were cancelled, or the Nomen dashed out. Among the Athenians this practise was called Sifachia, i. an easing of burden, or Chreocopia, a cutting off or striking out of debts.

N. Numerus, a forename to some houses of Rome.

Nundina, were the market days appointed every ninth day at Rome, for the peasants of the country to repair unto the City, to sell commodities or to buy their necessities. And hereupon Nundinarius, is the space of 20 daies, comprehending three market daies. Novis, were daies in the month so called, because they began the 9th day ever before the Ides: honored by the Romans both for the birthday of K. Servius, and also for the chasing out of the K.K. For otherwise it was not festival (as Ovid saith) Nonis cum cunctis Dies erat.

O Ovis or Ovis, were eggs set upon the votes in the solemnity of the Sortes turning at the plaies Chæris, to receive or foretell, as it seemeth by Levy the rates, which were performed with 24 courses to represent four and twenty hours of the day. Neither was it for nought, that choice was made of eggs, rather than of other things: for as eggs are laid by birds (the swiftest of all other living creatures) so they also were to contend and strive to be most swift, &c. of the became Cassus & Pallus (those renowned portemen) came of an egg, as Poets fable.

P Publius, a forename to some Roman families, Publius or Pubolus, ways solemn diet or counsel: whereat all the Senatus of Ætolia is furnished as council of public affairs.

Patres, were at Rome 100 Senators or Noblemen; counsellors of state, chosen in this manner: 30 out of every one of the 30 Curis, and those make 90: 1 more out of each tribe, (which then were but three) and one by Roman manner: and as this number made the body of the Nobility or Senatus at the first, so out of every Curia, he chose ten of the most personable and brave young men, to the number of 300, which he called Juniores to guard his person. From whence came the order of the knights or gentlemen of Rome, mean degree between the two orders of Nobles and Commons; and were the Juniores to represent the Senatus, when the places were void, and to augment the number of them. These were called Patres Juniores, Juniores, & Patres. And like as the former were named Patres Juniores to the latter sort, Patres Juniores gentium; alluding to the several ranges of the youth, who were four of them, Patres Juniores, such as ever were counted in heaven termed also Senatus: others, Patres Juniores, who had been men, and were after canonized gods. The other young and progeny of the Patres, were Patres Juniores, in opposition evermore of Patres Juniores, Commons.

Porticus, were either the porches & other stately buildings before temples, as belonging unto them: or the goodly galleries and walking places apart by themselves: under which men retired in the rains, and where they used to walk to cool themselves in summer.

Prætor, were either the porches & other stately buildings before temples, as belonging unto them: or the goodly galleries and walking places apart by themselves: under which men retired in the rains, and where they used to walk to cool themselves in summer.

Prætor,

The Second Index.

Prada, booty, pillage, or sackage in the own kind, as it was gotten from the enemy, to wit, slaves, prisoners, beasts, goods, armor, &c. Mannia, the mony raised of such pillage or prey, sold.

Prætor, one of the superior magistrats of Rome. In the City he ruled as chief justice: in the province he commanded as L. governor and deputy: and was General in the field as well as the Consul. At first, the name of Consul, Pretor, and Judges, was all one.

Prærogative centuriæ, were those centuries in Comitia Centuriata, which by lot had the first place in giving their voices: the rest that followed, were called Primo-vocata and Inter-vocata, and delivered their suffrages in their course.

Prætexta toga, a robe embroidered of purple, common to men and women, Ingenuitatis insigne, & ornamentum. Cicero in Verrem. 3. Whereby it appeareth, that it was allowed but to certain persons: and, as P. Mauritius writeth, to 6 sorts.

1 The children of the Patritii, until 17 years age. 2 All Senators upon festival daies. 3 Wardens at the games or plaies called Compitalitii. 4 All magistrats, as well in the City, as in the colonies or borough Towns incorporate, called Municipia, and Masters of Confraternities. 5 All Priests, and among them, the Augurs. 6 They that triumph. And this differed from the rest, being wrought with gold and damask work.

It seemeth that these differed likewise one from the other, in the manner of the guarding laid broader or narrower: as also in the rich or deep colour, whereupon they were called Pæptra: or that some of these robes were all one purple, other but parcel. And whereas the gentlemen of Rome are said Purpuram induere, it is to be understood, either of angusti-clavus, or else of some lighter colour, as the violet, and not of that rich red purple, which is scarlet. For that robe which was done upon our Saviour Christ, * one of the Evangelists called novulus, and other two, rogatus.

Pullarius, the Chickmaster or pullitier: one that had the charge and overseeing of the sacred chickens, kept in a pen or coop for auspicia: who, by observing their gesture or feeding betimes every morning, related what was foretold thereby good or bad. See more in Auspicia.

Pro-consult. Some have thought, Pro-consult, Pro-prætor, that they should be Pro-prætor, Pro-questor. Swritte otherwise thus, Pro-questor.

but they are in mine opinion out of the way: for indeed Pro-consult is he, who having bin Consul, went out of his magistracy at the years end, and nevertheless was sent forth into his Province again with full Consular authority: whereas Pro-consult (to speak precisely) is the Viz-consult, namely, one that having never been Consul created, but some privat person, yet upon an urgent occasion, might for the while supply the place of the Consul. The same is to be said of the rest. And hereof you may read in the oration of Cicero, pro lege Manilia. Howbeit in my translation of Livy, I have sometime used Viz-pretor and Viz-consul, for Pro-pretor and Pro-consul: because that manner of composition frameth well with our terms in English. Moreover, we read once in Livy of a Pro-dictator, in the proportionable signification to the other.

Quadrigati, were the Denarii Romani, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with four horses, called Quadriga.

Quadrans, a peece of base brasse coin or poise at Rome, the fourth part of As, which is a cue and a c.

Questors, were inferior officers in Rome, as treasurers to receive and lay out the City-mony, whereof there were Urbanæ, Provinciales, and Castrenses.

Quæstorium, a plot or quarter in the Roman camp, where the treasurer lodged and other officers of the camp.

Q. Quintus, the forename of sundry Romans. Quindecemviri, the same that Duumviri first, and Decemviri sacris faciundis. Their number was 15, and albeit they were increased by Sylla Dictator to 60, yet they retained still the name of Quindecemviri.

Quintana was a gate in the Roman camp, at which provision was brought in to serve the market. Read the annotation in the end of English Tachius.

Quinquæviri Mensarii, were certain men, five in number, appointed upon occasion to discharge the debts of the commons, so called of Mensa, a table set out in publick place: upon which they either counted or weighed their mony.

Quinquæviri muris reficiendis, were five officers at Rome chosen extraordinarily for repairing of the walls and turrets of the City.

Quinquatrus or Quinquatria, were certain feasts and games at Rome in the honor of Minerva. They continued five daies, and began the first day after the Ides of March, i. the 20 of March: and these were called Quinquatrus Majores. For others named Minores, set about the Ides of June, and that was the minstrels holiday, as appeareth in the ninth of Livy.

Quintilis, the month of July, before Julius Cæsar time.

Quirinalis, was a festival day to Quirinus, appointed for them to sacrifice, who had neglected or missed to do divine service in their parish at the feast Fornacalia: and it was called the fools holiday: for that they were ignorant of the time of the former feast, or knew not their own Curia.

Quirites, the name appropriate to the citizens of Rome: and so they loved to be called within the City: but in the camp, if the General gave them that term, it was taken for a great disgrace unto soldiers and men of arms.

R

The second Index.

Rorari, were light armed footmen, resembling our forlorn hope: so called a rore, i. Dew. For like as there falleth commonly a drizzling dew before a good shour of rain: so these Rorari skirmished loosely, before the legionary souldiers came to the battail.

Roftra, were three-tined pikes of brasse, set in the nose or beak-head of war-ships to offend the enemy, as appeareth by Virgil, Roftrisq; residentibus: and thereupon by Synecdoche, the stems of ships were so called. And for that the publick pulpit for orations at Rome, was reared and adorned with such, it also was called Roftra.

Rudera, [Cum militet religione tacti rudera jacerent]. To make sense of this place, I have translated Rudera, peeces of brasse mony: for that I cannot see what should be meant by rubbish stone in that place, which was not demolished by Annibal, for any thing that I can find; but only robbed of the silver & gold within the chappel of Fortuna: in stead whereof were found avis acerui: by reason that the souldiers, who had some sence of religion & touch of conscience (whereof their leader Annibal had never any) cast from them Rudera. Now, probable it is that Rudera is corruptly put for ara, the later end of the word: or if we admit Rudera: it is well known that Rudus as well as as signifieth brasse and brassen mony, as appeareth by Rudusculum the diminutive: for as of as came Aesculum, so of Rudus (no doubt) Rudusculum: and like as of Aesculum, Aesculanus, a god of the Patrimis, father of Argentarius (because copper & brasse mony was before silver coin:) so of Rudusculum, the gate Rudusculana in Rome, set out with brasse. Now that Rudusculum is put for a small peece of brasse coin, it is proved by the form of words in buying and selling, and in manumission (Rudusculo libram ferito) which is all one with are Libram percutit or ferit. By which I collect, that Rudera in this place may stand for ara, i. peeces of coin. For there went afore, avis acerui, which Horace putteth for heaps of brasse mony, and not for brassen images. And well it may be, that the souldiers upon some devotion, threw into the Church their oblations of such mony as they had in their belts or bandoliers. This conjecture & construction of mine may serve, untill somewhat here may be made of rubbish stone, or better exposition come in place. The word (I am sure will bear it, and the context in all sense and congruity, both require it.

Sacrare Deos after a devout and reverent manner they bowed unto the Idols or gods of the heathen as they passed by, and withal, touched their hands: which Lucretius theweth in these verses,

*Tam portas proper, aliena
Signa manu dextris ostendunt attoniti
Sape salutantum, tactis praterque manum.*
Sceleratus Ficus, a street in Rome named before-time Cyprius, which in the Sabine language signifieth [good:] but upon occasion of a wicked act committed therein, it was by the contrary, called Sceleratus.

Secession, was a general insurrection and revolt of the commons in Rome, wherein they left the City, until such time as they had the authority of their Tribunes strengthened and confirmed: yea, and certain laws enacted and established by a solemn oath, with a curse denounced to all them that went about to abrogate or abolish the same: which thereupon were called Sacrata leges.

Sex. Sextus. Serg. Sergius. Serv. Servius. Sall, forenames to Romans.

Sextilis, the month of August, so called by the Romans before Augustus Caesar his daies, for that it was the sixt in number: as Quintilis the fift, beginning at March.

Suburra. 97 a. In Juventutem grassantem in Suburra. It might well be that youkers there made a fray or committed some riot and felony: for it was a street most of all others frequented; and besides, in it kept strumpets and curtisans, like enough to give occasion of much quarrel & murther among youth, as appeareth by Juvenal and Martial in this Distichon.

Furia non nimium venas puella, Quales in media sedens Suburra.

Suffragis, were the voices of the people given by Centuries, Curia, or tribes, which in Rome went affirmatively under this form, Utrouque, be it according to your bill: and negatively thus, Antiquo, I deny or reject it.

Sordidus, were they that changed their weed in raui. i. (whiles either themselves or their friends were in trouble and danger of judgement) that is to say, put off white, which was the ordinary colour, and did on black: but if they changed their apparel upon sorrow and mourning for the loss of friends or any publick calamity, they were called rather Pulchri and Atrati.

Sella Curulis, a seat or chair of estate. One of the regal ornaments at Rome, belonging to the Kings first: after wards, during the free State, used by Dictators, Consuls, Pro-consuls, Pretors, and Propretors, Censors and Aediles, namely, those called curules, for distinction from those that were Plebeian and last of all, by the emperors in the time of the monarchy. This chair was made of Ivory: on which the above-said magistrates usually sat, not only in the Senat-house when they consulted or gave audience, or when they beheld the publick games & plays, & rode either in triumph, or otherwise in the streets, mounted upon their Chariots: but also at home within their private houses, & wheresoever else it pleased them: & this badge or ensign of honor they had both in time of their magistracy, & afterwards: &

as such Senators were called Curules (for the rest, who had not attained to those dignities, they named Pedanes, as some think, for that they went on foot to the Senate or places before mentioned) so those magistrates likewise above said, were entitled by the name of Curule. And Curule was that chair called either of Curia, a chariot, for that they sat thereupon within their chariots; or Curia, because it was made crooked or curved like unto our folding chairs.

Senator, A Counsellor of state, a name it was of honour, and not of age, as the word implicth: for to that place men attained often times to very young. Senat was the body of that degree and common Council, opposite unto Plebs at Rome; namely, where it was biceps and the whole people comprehended under Senatores and Plebeius. Sestertius, a small brazen peece of money at Rome, which being the six part of As, cometh to a cue or half a farthing.

Sextarius was the Basis of measures in Rome, as As of weights; and look how As was divided into twelve ounces, so Sextarius into twelve cyathi; and in measures Sextarius was the sixth part of Lextarius, which weighed twenty ounces, much about a wine pint and a half among us.

Of Sibylls books so often mentioned in Livy, which being three in number, were bought of Sibylla by King Tarquinius the proud, at the price of nine, after she had burned six of them before his face: which books were kept diligently in the Capitol: and wherout the Decemvirs by their learning made report of the will and pleasure of the gods: See A. Gallus, book 19 chapter.

Signum was the general name of all the ensignes in the field. But Aquila more particularly was the main standard to a whole legion: so called, for that upon the top of a spear was reared and fastned an Eagle in silver at full relief, and the same sometime was gilded standing upon a base or footstall of the same matter. The other ensignes, as well of cohorts, and which were bands of five hundred men usually, as of centuries, companies of hundred; named more especially vexilla, and were generally called Signa, had the portraiture of And Minotaurus, wolves, bores, horses, dragons, together with sundry other devices according to the fancy of the Colonels or captains, containing also the name of the cohort or Century, and of the legion to which they belonged.

Alimonia Atticum, As well ponderale which was weighed, as nummularium or nummularium, which was counted in money, was of two sorts: The less, of sixty pound Attick, and every one of them consisted of a hundred Drachma or Denarii Romani. If Mina then, be three pound two shillings six pence sterling, the less talent Attick amounteth to 187 pound ten shillings of our English money. The great, or simply the great, talent, in Livy, is fourscore Mina, and hath proportionable interest of Siguiterrans, ad minut, which cometh to two hundred and fifty pound sterling. Now was the Enboick talent (whereof Livy also speaketh) half of Talentum majus

Atticum. A forename to many houses of the Romans.

Tessudo, A target-fence, which the Legionary Romans soldiers, made either in the open field when they were overcharged with their enemies, or in approaching the walls of Towns to give assault. In the former, after they had enclosed within them their baggage and light armed men, they rested themselves upon their knees, with their targets close couched together over their heads, to avoid the enemies shot: and after they had well breathed they would rise up all at once again, fresh and lusty to a new skirmish. In the later, they had the like target-roof, but pent-house wise, one overlapped the other after the manner of tiles, and so they scaled walls without offence from above.

Templum hath in Livy three significations, 1. a sacred house or chappel dedicated to some god or goddess for divine service, as the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, &c. 2. An open place, from whence a man might see all about him, as having nothing to hinder his prospect, and which likewise might be seen from all parts; whereof cometh the verb Contemplari, to behold. And such did the Angurs chuse for to take their signs of bird flight. 3. Any place hallowed, although not for divine service, yet for debating of serious human affairs, as their Curia and Counsell-Chambers, yea, and the Rostra at Rome.

Thalassio, An Auspicate or lucky word used at Bridals or weddings in Rome, like to this among the Greeks, ὕμνος ὁ ὑμῶν, ὕμνος ὕμνος, O Hymene, O Hymene, &c. Catal.

Thensa whereof Livy writeth in the fifth & ninth books, were certain petty chariots or dreyes of silver or ivory, carrying the images and ornaments of their gods in great pomp upon certain high daies: and they who led the horses drawing the same, wore their richest apparel, holding in their hands and training the false reins stretched out at length in solemn wise, whereupon Festus thinketh they took the name Thensa quasi Tensa.

Trabea was a roial robe or mantle of estate, all of deep purple or scarlet only, at the first: but afterwards, embroidered richly with gold. Livy seemeth to confound it with Vestis purpurea, Picta, Palmata, and Triumphalis. And in truth, all one they were in the principal substance and matter thereof, namely purple or scarlet; but different in the setting out, being embroidered with gold; more or less, distinguished also with white among (for that was a roial colour) as may appear by the diadem, which was a white wreath, or band done about the head of Kings, or in the manner of the work: for either it was palmata, so called called lucubratiſſima, i. e. of the broad buttons of gold, and lucubratiſſima, to the breadth of ones hand, as Festus thinketh: or branched and damasked with flower-work, like to the date-tree: or else pillari, of tiſſew or embroidery.

Tribuns of the Commons were certain Magiſtrates, as Provosts or Protectors of the Commons, to reſtrain and keep down the exceſſive power of the nobility: choſen and confirmed by the general oath of the people, whereby they were Sacrosancti, i. e. ſacred or inviolable, and no violence might be done to their perſon. They had a negative voice and power of inhibition, called Interceſſio, whereby they might croſs and ſtop the proceedings of the Senate, or any magiſtrat, ſave only the Dictator: even the very Conſuls, whom in ſome caſe they might command.

Tribuns military in Conſuls authority, or Conſulari, governed the ſtate of Rome many years in ſtead of Conſuls.

Tribuns military in the army, were Colonels bove a thouſand.

Tribuni aſarii, were the keepers of the City a. i. chamber or common Treafure, as it were, the maſters of the exchequer.

Tribus in Rome, firſt three, containing each of them ten Claſſes: but afterwards they were ſixty-five and thirty, containing all the natural citizens of Rome.

Tribu moveri, was a kind of ignominy and diſgrace, when a man was diſplaced by the cenſors out of his own tribe into another more baſe than it, and namely, ſubſtituta in urbanam: of which urbana there were four, Suburana, Esquilina, Palatina and Collina: into which King Servius diſtributed thoſe that were manumitted, and Rullus afterwards forenſem tur-

Triumviri Monetales, Three officers for the mint of money, either braſs, ſilver, or gold. They are repreſented in old coins by theſe five letters ſtamped thereupon, E. A. A. F. F. ſtood for aurum, argentum, ſtando, ferendo: that is, to ſay, for the melting, coining, and ſtamping of braſs, ſilver, and gold. They were afterwards four in number, and named Quatuor-

Triumviri or Treſviri nocturni, Three overſeers of the night-watch, for fire, &c.

Triumviri Menſarii, Three Commiſſaries deputated for the time, and as occaſion required, in ſtead of bankers or treaſurers to receive a large ſtock of money, and to lay the ſame out upon extraordinary charges, as in the time of the ſecond Punic war, when the City chamber was without money. Which ſtock was put into their hands out of private mens purſes, by way of voluntary benevolence and contribution, as appeareth in the ſix and twentieth book of Livy.

Triumviri [Extraordinarii] Three likewiſe to levy ſouldiers and able men for to bear arms (without the uſual order of ſouldiers) throughout Italy, upon ſome ſpecial occaſions.

Triumviri coloniæ deducendis, three commiſſioners who had authority to enrol new inhabitants into any colony: alſo to ſet out and divide the City lands gotten by conqueſt, at their diſcretion among them.

Triumviri alſo there were three, Wardens to overſee the ſatiſfices, the oblations and offerings to the Gods.

Taurilia, certain feſtival games inſtituted (as Festus ſaith) by King Targuius the proud, for to pacify the infernal gods: upon occaſion of a contagious malady that hapned to women great with child, endangering both them and thoſe they went with: which aroſe upon the corrupt fleſh ſold abroad in the market of oxen and bulls, killed for ſatiſfices: whereupon the money employed about thoſe ſolemnities, was called Tauricum aſ.

Solitavilia or Sacra avilia, was a ſolemn ſatiſſice at the luſtration, review, or purging of the City every fifth year: and this was called Luſtrum conditum. It was performed by killing a bull, a ram, and a bore. At which ſolemnity all that were able to bear arms, aſſembled in order of battail.

Triumph, a ſolemnity in honor of them who have vanquiſhed their enemies: ſo called, for that their ſouldiers reſounded, Io triumphe: (as Varro thinketh) or of Triumphus for Triumpus, one of Æneæ names, the firſt inventor thereof: or of Triumphus, three voices: becauſe it was granted by the ſuffrages of ſouldiers, Senators, and common people: as it may appear in Livy, by the triumph of Luſtulus Emilius, who had like to have been diſappointed thereof, by his own ſouldiers.

Venus Erycina, Ovid. 4. E. 8. ſc. 1. nomina colle ſenot: ſhe was ſo called of a promontory in Sicily, called Eryx, where there was a goodly temple built in the honour of Venus: and afterwards at Rome alſo in memorial thereof.

Versus Feſcennini, certain licentious and unchaſt ſongs, uſed among the Painini at weddings: the manner whereof, came firſt from the city Feſcennium (as ſome think) or as others, Quia feſcennini putabantur carere, becauſe they were thought to have vertue to withſtand witchcraft and ſorcery.

Vestales virgines, were certain profeſſed Nuns vowing virginity, who had the keeping of the ſacred fire of Veſta. Neque aliud veſtam, quam puram, intellige flammam. Ovid. This Veſta was brought from Troy with the image of Minerva, called Palladium, and other holy reliques.

Vltre tribua, legionaria, were certain City works, for which the cenſors did bargain with the Publicans or undertakers, at a price.

Verbuſa,

Verbena, although it signifieth a speciall herb, called Verbenaca, i.e. verven in English, and in Greek ἀνίσχυρος, because doves delight much to be above it: yet the word is attributed to divers other herbs put to holy use among the Painims, which are called Sagina in Latine, and in Greek ισαγόβρανα. But Dioscorides describeth one sort thereof which runneth by the ground, and groweth not so high as our vervin doth, and it seemeth to be that which the Physicians, Herbarists, and Apothecaries call Gramen, ayeweds in Greek, dent de chien in French: and the coich grasse in English: according to which saith Livy, Fa-

cialis ex arce puram graminis herba attulit. Victoriatu, i.e. quinarium nummus, A piece of Roman silver coin, half Denarius, and a double Sestertius, having the image of Victoria stamped upon it, either standing on foot crowned with a chaplet of bay, or else carried in a triumphall chariot drawn with four steeds, holding forth in her right hand the foresaid garland, as is to be seen in divers antiquities of coin. Veteres signifieth a place in Rome called Veteres: Curia in respect of Novae, or certain shops called Argentaria of bankers, in regard of others also, named Novae.

A Table of all the Orations in Titus Livius, by way of division of the general into particular members, fitted for all sorts of speaking or writing, and digested according to the severall places of the three principall heads of all Causes in Oratory, to wit, the Deliberative, the Demonstrative, and the Judiciall.

To the High and Mighty Princess, and his most Gracious L A D Y,

CHRISTINA,

By the Grace of God Queen of the S W E D E S, G O T H S, V A N D A L S and the adjoining Provinces.

Madam,

I hath happily fain out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning, rarely to be found in so great a Majesty, have given me advantage of omitting one of those two Subjects which usually are the Contents of Dedicatory Epistles. For I have so many reasons to declare why I present this Supplement to your Majesty, that if I were forced likewise to declare the Argument of the Work, to what End, and in what Manner it is contrived, I could not accomplish it without a long and tedious Epistle. But now those Your two Virtues I mentioned, have freed me of this Necessity, seeing out of your Humanity you condescended to read the Work while it was in Composing, and by your Learning more fully understood, then I or any other could expound what was superfluous, and what wanting in it. I will not therefore accuse the meanness of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that this my Design hath no more happily succeeded, (Let those men pretend shortness of time, multitude of business or incommodities of sickness, who aim at other Glory besides that of Obedience) it sufficeth me, I am conscious, that in writing this, I have observed the benefit of your Studies, and in making it Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of L I V Y's HISTORY, which at that time you diligently read, I had finished this Work as a Bridge over a broken Passage, You were pleased (according to Your excellent and well known Goodness) to expresse Your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, so to judge them fit of Publick View, that others might likewise be profited by them. Wherein You manifested both your Wisdom and your Bounty: Your Bounty, in that what was solely intended for your own service, you were willing should be useful unto all: Your Wisdom in that, in this new beginning and encrease of Learning, which by your example and Help the North doth greedily receive and happily improve, you have encouraged other men to exercise their Wit and Industry in publishing more Accurate and Learned Writings, when they shall have understood with how much Candor and Clemency You accept this rude and unpolished Piece of mine. When therefore I see not only those who are born unto your service, but many also of strange Nations most willingly entertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be backward in my Duty, who, if not alone, yet amongst a few of your most Faithful and nearest Subjects, am in a peculiar manner obliged by your Majesty? I am indeed His
* 2 who

The Epistle Dedicatory.

who created all things, neither from any other do I expect a True and Lasting Felicity; neither do I bear a mind inferior to so great a Hope: But as to the Offices of this Life I am by him bestowed upon your Majesty, as by infallible Arguments, to your self not unknown, may be demonstrated. Wherefore my constant and resolved Rule of living (which, if I attain not unto, as I am willing and ought to do, yet I aim at and endeavour) is, to attend God's will only in those things which are expressly commanded or forbidden; in Actions indifferent and arbitrary to be guided by your Majesty alone; which I the rather strive to perform, because I know it is your Pleasure. And truly this were a sufficient tie of my Obedience and Reverence, if you had not otherwise both by your Virtues and Deserts obliged me, both which are so ample and of so effectual an Influence, that it is hard to say whether in Contemplation of them I am more willing to serve you, or for other Reasons more strictly bound to it. I find my self now involved in a very doubtful Case, and on both sides much perplexed: For if I say what I have intended, as my desire is, and as is Just and Right, I may happily not be relished by your Majesty, who do more freely exercise your Virtues, and fasten your Favours, then willingly hear them repeated. And if in the Mention thereof I shall omit any thing, I shall fail in my Duty, and Detract from Your Praises, which (with as fervent a desire and good will as I prosecute them) had I liberty to expatiate, I could in no wise according to their Dignity set forth, much less being streightened within the narrow limits of an Epistle. Nevertheless I am confident, that the Temper of the business (which your self cannot disallow) is agreeable, as to the present purpose, so to both our Dispositions. For I abhor Flattery as doth your Majesty; neither am I more willing to speak any thing in such a strain, then Your self to hear it. And, according to your discerning Spirit, you are not ignorant that I am of this mind, that if it were in my choice whether to offend You in doing You Good, or please You by Flattery, I should without scruple chuse the former, which few Subjects can do and few Princes endure. Hinder not therefore my desires which cannot offend on that part: Give us leave to acknowledge what we have received; and if miserable men are freely allowed to complain, why should your Majesty forbid us modestly to boast of our Happinesse under such a Prince as Your self? Neither ought this, the only Reward of your good Deeds, or the Fruit of our Thankfulness to perish; we then again a fresh receive benefits when we repeat them. But I see what is happened, whilst I beg leave to Write I loose both Time and Space. What therefore I am about to say, shall be into a few Periods digested, and I shall of every kind speak somewhat only in Summe. As to those your Virtues in herewith you have magnificently Adorned this Empire; that I may briefly declare what I think, I shall borrow a Sentence from our beloved Tacitus; in which Author, You know, Tiberius reproacheth C. Cæsar, That he had all the Vices of L. Sylla, but not so much as one of his Virtues: which may justly be inverted as to Your Majesty, that You have acquired all the Virtues of Your Predecessors, omitting what Vices were in them, insomuch as You have augmented their Ancient Honours by Virtues new and heretofore unknown to this Kingdom. I believe that former Ages wanted not excellent Kings, yet, however it came to pass, the Sweetick affairs never ascended to any illustrious or durable greatness in their dayes; the Praise of that work properly belongs to the Gustavides, of whom not any one ever Reigned without some Memorable profit to the Countrey: for even the Error of some have proved of good use; the Case of Ericus and Sigismund instructeth Posterity wherein Kings may offend: and others are admonished by the severity of Charles, how unsafe it is to provoke Princes to Anger. But what Pen or what Oration can sufficiently declare the

the Immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great, that if you compare them with others, you will easily prefer them before others; but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest and the other Greatest, then discern which of the two excelled. For it is a great Error and blindness of judgment to measure the Greatnesse of Kings by the outward Splendor of their Actions, and respect that only.

It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had Ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glorie of this Kingdom, even by GUSTAVUS the Great, and his Daughter CHRISTINA. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most Accurately and Skilfully manage affairs at Home: God having reserved Your selfe, Madam, to a greater work, the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace, hath every way accomplished You for so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necessity of War, You could not complain of any thing wanting in Your self to the highest Praise in such an Employment. For whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercise, You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the best Emperors, as Counsel in Perplexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperity, Diligence, Wisdom, Faithfulness in all things; whereby after many and famous Victories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of your Reigne, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Hast declare; I shall only name the encrease of the City, many Towns built and well constituted, Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes, Manners amended, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreased, the Universities enriched, Schools erected, Merchandize flourishing, many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the simplicity of the Ancients; your care and diligence adhibited toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-ways, building of Inns, and indeed toward all things which we see, which we are sensible of, and the benefit whereof we enjoy; so that I may justly account those my Countrymen of Germany happy who shall hereafter rest under your Protection: whom I would have, with my self and all other Your Subjects, think no sign surer of God's Anger or Favour toward them, then as he shall long preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eyes by reason of the misery of times past, or are so hindred by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatnesse of so Benigne and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy thereof. For the Splendor of it is not derived, as that of a Candle or Torch, which failing, the remaining substance appears fouler; but like that of the Sun, True, and Pure, and Imate, neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eyes, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judgments as to denie they see it. But though it be troublesome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation, I shall not endeavour to comprehend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time, or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolixe in the Commemoration of your benefits bestowed-bestowed on me, as being not so well known to the World, and more properly belonging to the Causes of this Dedication, as likewise not unworthy Monuments of your Virtues. But I must first acknowledge the Providence of God which I have alwaies found most manifestly present in this businesse. When for many years in Germany I continued in such a condition of life (for many reasons thereunto perswading me) as not resolutely addicted to any particular Profession, yet ready to accept of any which should lawfully offer it self: in all that while no man determined my liberty with obligation to any calling. In the mean time I spent not that my leisure in idleness, but bestowed it in those Studies to the which (by what afterward hapned, I evidently understood) I was from my infancie ordained. The time now grew on, Madam, wherein I was to be dedicated to Your Majesties Service, and Benedict Skytte came to Argentoratus, whom Your Majestie hath deservedly honoured with many Favors, and lastly with the Dignitie of a Senator. By him invited I came to Your Universitie, where instructing the Youth with care and diligence, though I had an earnest desire to see Your Majestie, yet I preferred the necessitie of my present Office, before the sweetnesse of an happinesse not yet due to me. When I had now three years been debarred of any Conference with your Majestie, having lately taken upon Your Self the Administration of Your Realm, upon occasion of a Funeral You came to Upsal. And from that time I shall begin the Commemoration of Your Favours towards me. The last Office of Love was then performed to my Patron John Skytte Senator, whose praises according to the Dutie of my Place, I endeavoured to set forth in a Funeral Oration; and this was the first Speech I made in Your hearing: But when by the cheerfulnes of your most Serene Countenance, You discovered both Your understanding of what was spoken, and Your Favour to the Speaker, I was so infinitely possessed with Pleasure and Admiration, that thenceforward I resolved to esteem You not only as a Queen of Me and Your Kingdomes, but Princesse of all Virtues and Wisdom. The same Favour I received two years after, when as often as you came to Upsal, you heard my Discourses upon any Subject you propounded. Intending afterward to accumulate more Favours upon me, You invited me to Court, not only beyond my Hope, but besides my Thoughts of any such thing: what You there bestowed upon me, can scarce by a long Oration be declared: You made me Keeper of Your Librarie, then which I know none so soon after its first beginning, more plentiful in Books, which hath been a main help to me in Compiling this Supplement. You gave me the Title of your Historiographer, that when you should think fit I might deliver to Posterity the Memory of things done or to be transacted. You afforded me Lodging in your Court, not only very convenient, but (which is rarely found in so frequented a Place) very private and quiet also, and a Stipend, which by experience I have found, very subject to Envy. And whereas these may be esteemed Favours of the highest rank, you have, by what after followed, caused them to be esteemed small ones: For when you desired the Knowledge of the Greeke Tongue, that you might from their own Mouths understand the sense of the most excellent writers in Civil and Moral Wisdom, you did so by degrees induce me to the Office of your Instructor therein, being ignorant of your Purpose, that at length I understood I had taught much indeed, when on the sudden I found you had Learnt so much. By this your Art in that small time you could allow out of two years to such a Study (being a Queen actually Reigning, waging VVar, often holding Parliaments, every day Councils, and constantly distracted with other business) you made such an improvement that after Trial in Polybius and Plutarch, you read Plato also, and that with such understanding, that little wanting my help, you could hastily Translate him into Elegant Latine in most significant Expressions, and of Your self observe and for true reasons Correct the Error of Translations made with the great pains of Learned men. Whereby I reaped so great and various fruits of purest pleasure, as I could not but often ingenuously confesse to my most intimate acquaintance, That whatsoever Time, or Labour, or Study, or Care I bestowed in this employment (for Trouble, I call my Conscience to witnesse, I never felt any) I thought all abundantly recompensed with that reward I could every hour receive from you. For to omit other benefits, what an advantage was even in this, to be every day in the presence of so great a Prince, to be seen and countenanced by You, to obtain the Title, Place and Honour of a Favourite? Truly my Happinesse seemed so great to me, that I began to be afraid of it. For though, by the Grace of God, I ever put off these my worldly Accoutrements, as knowing I must one day leave them or they me, yet out of impotency of mind I might by too great happiness have grown insolent, but that by certain Arguments I learnt in time to know that so great a fortune was not conferred as Due to any man's Merits, but as the free gift of your Grace and good will. And in this so high and great an Happinesse there are many excellent Circumstances particularly considerable, I am tied only to my own Vocation, employed only in mine own Studies, that is, I am so free that I am not employed and wearied in any service not proper to my own Office and calling. Neither have you a care of my Time and Health only, but also of my Modesty and Bashfulness. I appear not but at the time of your Studies, neither then do I break in without command, to stand as an idle and dumb Spectator, vainly loosing time, or boldly vaunting of my Liberty and Familiarity. Neither is my work base or vile, we do nothing which requires either Secrecy or Excuse; whosoever will not betray his own ignorance must needs confesse the employment on my part worthy of a man, on yours becoming a Prince. Hitherto I have related part of the Favours you have bestowed on my Person; it remains likewise I should acknowledge those Favours (as much more bestowed on me) which you have conferred on others by my Intercession. In which confession I have cause to fear, that I shall not only contract Envy to my selfe, but give Occasion to others to accuse your Majestie, as being too facile in granting what is requested. To these I shall answer, That I do indeed acknowledge and admire your Goodnesse, which hath far exceeded my Deserts, and that others also may obtain equal or greater Favours if they ask them with the same Respect that I have done: as first, I never desired any thing but what was Just and Equal; nor secondly, any thing misbecoming the Office and Majestie of my Prince; thirdly, by all those Boons I have obtained for others, I know not that I am a penny the richer. But in this strait, wherein it is easier to think of more things then to write them, many things come into my mind which I am forced to pretermitt. This I shall say, I am in doubt whether I am more beholding to your Majestie for small favours bestowed at my Request, or for the great ones; for as these carried the greater Price, the others did more manifest your Humanitie. That your mind capable of highest things would condescend to so little ones. We Read of a King, who when a Phylosopher asked of him a Groat, said, It was too little for a King to give; when he presently asked a Talent, said, It was too much for a Phylosopher to receive. Your Majestie hath more magnificently used the same Method, in Your smaller favours, regarding what was fit for me to receive; in the greater, what became Your self to give. With the like Clemency You have had compassion on some miserable men (whom I therefore commended to Your Majestie because none had pity on them) and done that which I dare yet scarce speak, both for the Greatnesse of the Thing, and for the Greatnesse of the Thanks due, which cannot cannot at present be expressed. But I may happily be accused of Folly, that I should think your favours may be more Elegantly declared or praised by any man's Oration, then by your own Deeds and Works; or that I should think you stand in need of my Commendation for having bountifully remitted to the City of the Vangiones the greater part of their Taxes, by which benefit I believe the City was preserved, and shall do well and justly if they honour your Majestie as a second Foundress; You have hereby for ever obliged the Commonwealth of the Vangiones, and me in particular, making us your everlasting Debtors. For I know not who of Right oweth most to you, they who received the benefit or he who procured it at your Hands. Is there any thing can be equalled to, or preferred before what I have already said? Yes surely, even this; In that you have promised to make me a better man, not, as all men are improved, by Laws and Manners, nor, as many, by Example, but, as yet none, by Your care and Diligence in Conversing with me: For you have promised to make Enquiry with me (that is to direct and shew me) how Wise and Prudent men ought to be qualified, and by what signes they may be discovered; which when I have learned, I make no question of being much better then now I am. And I so much value this your Promise, that I would not free your Majestie from your Obligation for half your Kingdom: And I shall not refuse, whensoever You Command, to declare the Reasons of this my Resolution. And to perform this, will, I suppose, be neither unpleasant to You, nor yet Difficult, seeing You tend forward to the height of that Wisdom, which even among the Learned you shall find more who pretend to teach then do indeed truly know & understand it. In this thing I may wel boast whereby I am more happy, not only then ordinary men, but the servants of Solomon himself, who are justly esteemed happy in having opportunity of hearing his Wisdom, but would have been much more happy if he had taken peculiar Care to have instructed them in his own Person; which we read not he ever did. But I perceive that contrary to my will and the nature of my Argument, the very Paper admonisheth me to make an end: I shall therefore now be silent, humbly adoring your Majestie, and giving You to understand, That not only this Book is Dedicated to Your Majestie, but my whole self with all my Soul and the Affections thereof, with what I am, or have, or can do, being for Your sake simply willing to do any thing whatsoever without exception, unless what is against Conscience, or beyond my Abilities to perform.

The Epistle Dedicatory.

THE SUPPLEMENT OF LIVIE'S HISTORY

By J. FREINSHEMIUS.

THE FIRST BOOK.

In place of LIVIE'S XIth Book.

Collected out of Authors whose Names are in the Margin annexed.

THE Power of the Samnites was now by many Battels much broken, neither was any doubt made of happily finishing the War, in case the Enemy in this low and weak condition were prevented of time sufficient to recollect and strengthen his spirits. Therefore Q. Fabius the Consul, now in the heat of his Youth, and assuring himself the glory of putting an end to this War, having made a sudden levy, marcheth incontinently with his Army into Campania. For the Samnites being an hardy people, and by all their overthrows brought rather into Despair than Fear, while the former Consuls carried back the Legions to Rome attending on their Triumph, laid hold on that opportunity, and what with the Relicks of their former Armies, and some new Levies, had gathered together a considerable force, and because they knew the Plague was at Rome, and had heard that the present Consuls were men not much to be feared, either for any experience in Marshal affair, or for any great Authority they had, they grew confident, invaded, depopulated, and wasted the Territories of the Campanians whom they had always hated, but now more vehemently, looking on them as the Authors of the dangers and calamities they now sustained. The Roman General had a heart no way misbecoming the dignity of his Fabian-Family, but the small account he made of a Nation so often beaten by his Country-men, and his earnestness of being in action, did at this time quite bereave him of all Counsel and Deliberation. He marcheth swiftly towards the enemy, and having discovered the Samnite scouts, who upon sight of the Roman troops retired back to their own main Body, and judging this to be a flight of the whole Host, without any consideration had either of the place or the condition of his men, he commands in all haste that may be the Battel to be begun, as if the hope of Victory consisted only in Expedition: But the Samnites having notice of their approach, were very circumspect, had seized on advantageous places, marshalled their Army, and incensed the minds of their Souldiery with their commanders Orations; and consequently the Event of the Battel was accordingly; for the Samnites being in good Rank, and well prepared, made no great business to rout the Romans, being very weary with their journey and furious march, out of all order, as if they came rather to plunder than to fight. Three thousand of Fabius his men were lost, a greater number wounded, and only by the benefit of the Night was the total destruction of his Army prevented. Then retiring to a more commodious place, as well as in such a Consternation may be expected, they fortified their Camp, where there was little better comfort or confidence than in the field, the Weary had no convenience of rest, the Hungry wanted food, and the Wounded had no application of Medicines, for issuing out with their weapons only, they had left all their carriage and baggage in the former Camp.

So that the whole night was passed away with the Groans of the dying, and the Complaints of the living, every one with horror and despair waiting for the next day as their last. For being tired with labour, distempered with long watchings, weakened with wounds, terrified with an unlucky overthrow, and their number much diminished, they thought it impossible to resist the enemy, whom when they were found and entire both in body and mind, and filled with hopes of Victory, they were not able to encounter upon even terms. Things being at this ill pass the Remedy (as it often happens) proceeded from the enemies mistake, who daunted with the Rumour of the other Consul's approach, and fearing lest while he assaulted Fabius his Camp, the new forces would surround him, contented himself with what successe he had above his hope obtained, and diverted his course another way. The Enemy being removed, the Romans likewise betook themselves to a safer Refuge: when these tidings were brought to Rome, the City was exceedingly moved, not so much with the losse, as the disgrace of the business, and took it deeply to heart, That the longest war they were ever troubled with, when it was now just at a period, should by the rashness of one Consul be revived again, and that more formidably then before, by reason of the great hopes and confidence which the Samnites would assume in contemplation of this their success. Neither was this the sense of the Tribunes of people alone, whose proper art it was by their frequent Orations to fill the Citizens minds with envy and hatred, but even the Fathers, upon discuss of the business, pronounced very heavy and severe sentences, and a Decree was made by the Senate, That Fabius the Consul should be commended at a certain day appointed to come and plead his cause at Rome. He was no sooner at Rome, but a swarm of accusers flew about him; and indeed the fault could not be excused, and what was only left of moment on his behalf, even the esteem of old Fabius, was made use of as an argument against him; for they thought him least of all men to be pardoned, who being extracted from so illustrious a Parent, and brought up in the midst of his Fathers triumphs, had, by his Imprudence with so foul an overthrow, cast a stain not only on the Roman Glory, but on the renown of his own Family, and the many victories of his Ancestors obtained. Their minds being thus exasperated (that it was not likly the Defendant should have a fair hearing) were first by the consideration of his Fathers eminent Piety, and afterward with his Oration totally appeased. For he fearing least for this miscarriage his person would be removed from his Command, insisted not at all in excusing the Crime, but modestly recounting his own and his forefathers merits, desired there might not be in his old age so ignominious a Character imprinted on the Fabian Family: Neither did he require that for the sake of so many other Fabii, who almost from the foundation of the City, had by their virtue and counsel augmented the Roman Empire: nor that for the sake of those three hundred Fabii, who by their own deaths, and almost the total loss of the Fabian Name, had protected the Commonwealth, the error of one single person should be forgiven, if it were found remediless, and that a greater commodity would accrue from the punishment then the preservation of his son. But whatsoever was in this young man to be feared, is already come to pass, whereas unless we cut off our own hopes, I cannot say by an unjust, but by an untimely severity, Those many good deeds which his spirit and lively Genius, which likewise his virtue (by me, in your esteem, none of the worst Tutors, being disciplin'd and directed) doth fairly promise, are yet justly to be expected. It hath turned to the improvement of many mens wisdom and circumspection, that they miscarried in the beginning of Affairs, who being admonished of their error, have often recompensed small losses with larger success; and I doubt whether it ought not rather to be imputed to the Envy of Fortune then to any man's fault, that the constant felicity both of the Commonwealth, and our Family, is by a small detriment thus interrupted; though indeed it is rather to be accounted the good will then the envy of the Gods, by whose providence it is come to pass, that with this overthrow, not so fatal to the City as effectual to our instruction, we are put in mind of our humane condition, to abate that deadly pride which is usually the effect of excessive Prosperity. Whatsoever the matter is, Countrymen, I did certainly foresee some ill luck, when upon the Convention of the Senate, I did earnestly solicit you would not create my son Consul. For when I considered that my Father, Grandfather, Great-Grandfather, and other my Ancestors had frequently, and my self five times born that Office, I began to mistrust whether the Gods or Men would willingly, and with an equal mind, suffer the supreme Honour to continue in the same Family. And I wish my prayers had then prevailed, or that you would be pleased still to continue the benefit bestow'd: lest what against my will, you confer'd on my son as a Token of Honour, prove an occasion of unheard-of Infamy to us both; nay, lest your selves be suspected of Rashness, for posterity will judge, that either you conferred the command on Q. Fabius without cause, or that without cause ye deprive him of it, if by a contrary Judgment ye shall destroy your former Sentence. But if you will please to decree things more favourably, both your own Authority, and the reputation of the Fabian Family shall yet stand sound, and his youthful folly, as it was committed with some loss to the Commonwealth, shall be amended to its greater emolument and profit. But who dares promise these things? Truly, Countrymen, I will, even I will engage my self to the Commonwealth for my son, and happy may it prove to the Senate and People of Rome, and our own private Family; I will also go Legate to the Consul, and partake of whatsoever fortune he shall happen either to find or to make. My spirits are yet vigorous, neither, considering mine age, is the strength of my body much * much decayed, I can performe a souldiers duty, I can stand in Battel, and if to all things else I were impotent, yet with the Memory of my Former victories I can both terrifie the Enemy and Encourage our own Souldiers; and, which is of greatest concernment, I can with Counsel and Caution temper and direct the impetuous Heat of the Consull's youth which is the only Cause of the last Misfortune; If I knew not the Disposition of my sonne, and were not assured he would embrace any good direction, I would not certainly now see the end of my life hitherto led without Blemish, after the bearing so many Consulships both to my owne likeing and yours, after signal victories and illustrious Triumphs, I would not hazard all my Glory purchased with so many yeares travel and danger, at home and abroad, by trusting it to the Rashness of one inconsiderate young man.

This Oration did both move the mindes of all who were present, and also ingenerate a Confidence of better success for the future. Old Fabius was by an Unanimous consent created Legate, all preparations were made with what diligence care and Expedition might be; and the Consul took the field with no less favour and Hope of the People, then he had lately returned with their indignation and reproaches. Henteforward both in their march and in their Camps nothing was omitted either of good Discipline, or what the art and experience of an old General could ordaine, and those Companions whom Q. Fabius the Father had by good turnes, or by the admiration of his virtue obliged to himselfe, were very ready to perform whatsoever was enjoyned them; the Souldiers also greedy to blot out their former disgrace, and confiding in the Counsel of a Leader, under whose conduct they remembered the Samnites to have been often beaten by themselves: and their Fathers did earnestly desire opportunity of encountering the Enemy. On the other side the Samnites were no less elevated with contemplation of their late victory; so that one Party striving to retaine their purchas'd Glory, the other to repair what was lost, they joyned issue most vehemently with all the force and might on both sides; And now behold the Romans in a worse condition then before, C. Pontius Herennius the Enemies General having hemm'd in the Consul with a select band; when Maximus observing the danger his son was in, setting spurre to horse flings himself into the thickest of the Enemies Troopes: He was followed immediately by a Party of Horse, who beside the motion of their own Courage were ashamed to see one Old man assault with a resolution to overcome so many spiritfull young Lads in the flower of their strength. This sudden storme govern'd the Fortune of the whole Battel; The Roman Legions animated with the boldness of their Cavaltie, at first well received the Enemy, and straightway repell'd them: Herennius in vaine resisting, who, that day performing all the Offices both of a good General and a good Souldier, endeavouring to rally his files to retaine the Cowardly, and withstand the assailants, could neither hinder the Flight of his men, nor afterward find opportunity of escape for himself. Four thousand Samnites were taken with their General, The Battel and the flight swallowed up 24000. The Enemies Camp was likewise seized on with vast plunder in it, which was quickly much encreased by Forrage of their Grounds, and taking in of Towns both by storme and upon Mercy; This great change of Affaires was wrought by the access of one onely Person, inso much that the lately Victorious army is now routed by the Conquer'd party, and the Consull carries away captive that General by whom he was formerly himselfe shamefully beaten, which was a pleasing spectacle to the Romans, and a great Ornament to his Triumph, which by the ready good-will of the People he made into the City the next year. While the Fabii thus order'd things in Samnium, the other Consull D. Brutus (whose Province was among the Falisci) had the like happy success: For being assisted by Sp. Carvilius his Legate (for 'twas thought fit to joyne a Legate also with him, a man as skilful in war, so one that had experience of the Enemy, against whom last year he did fortunately mannage affaires) he did waite no small of the Residue of Etruria, and overcame in a set battel the Falisci daring to encounter with him. These newes being brought to Rome, when the time of Conveneing the Senate was come, and it seemed not fit for the Commonwealth to withdraw the Consulls from their charges, an Interregnum was agreed upon; The Regent L. Posthumius Megellus, in a Court of his own holding, was himselfe declared Consull; a precedent till that day unheard of, unless in the Person of Appius Claudius, which nevertheless no good man approved. But Posthumius behaved himself in his Magistracy with as much arrogance as he assum'd it. Being vainly puff'd up with the Nobility of his Extraction, and this his third Consulship, he did utterly despise his Colleague for this year, C. Junius Brutus as one much below him, being but a Plebeian. When the Provinces came to be disputed on, he would not suffer Brutus to be compared with him, nor lots to be cast; out of all Order claiming the Administration of the Samnitick warre as his Due, inso much as according to his own saying, he had in his two former Consulships done great things against that Enemy. The business being canvass'd with much contention in the Senate, when C. Junius perceived he was not able to maintaine his Right against the Grace and Power of his Colleague, did at length declare he would desist, lest by the discord of the Consulls the Publick good might be hindred. The Pestilence did still continually rage both in City and Countrey, for which having tried all remedies now for three yeares, they could not either with their divine or humane applications allay it: Wherefore consulting either with the books of the Sybilis or the Oracle of Delfos (for this also is reported) they sent Ten Ambassadors to fetch Asclepius to Rome from Epidaurus where it is said he was borne; For though the Answer were doubtful, neither could the Fathers foresee the - event of things, they thought fit to obey the Gods who would themselves open a way for their fortunes to proceed by. A very strange thing then fell out, but of most undoubted truth, by reason of the sincerity of so many Authors affirming it, as likewise appears by the structure of the Chappel in Tibur then erected and consecrated; When the Roman Embassadors had deliver'd their Message, the Epidaurians entertain'd them kindly, but because it did not appear what was convenient to be granted them, they were conducted to the Temple with liberty to convey away what should seem convenient for their use. The Altars of this God among the Gracians was most commonly in open and high Places; the Epidaurians also five miles from their City had a Temple of greatest Fame in those dayes, and very rich by the gifts of men who believed their health to proceed from thence; Being brought hither, while they stand in admiration of the Largeness of the Statue which was cut by the excellent skill of Thrasymedes the Parian; Behold an huge Serpent creeping out of a secret place fills all their mindes with horreur and Devotion: For the Priests with great veneration cryed out, The God himselfe is in this Snake, and being sometimes seen in this shape, it alwayes imports a good and healthful Omen. Two dayes was he seen in the Temple and then again withdrew himself; the third day through the midst of the throng of Spectatours and Adorers he went directly to the Port where the Roman vessel attended them, and entring into the Ship, he rolls himself up according to his spiral manner, in the Cabbin of Q. Ogulnius President of the Embassy. There is an antient story that the same Esculapins having assumed the forme of a Serpent was carried from Epidaurus to Sicyon by a Loake of Mules, one Nicagora, the wife of Echetimus driving the waine.

- The Romans rejoycing at the good Omen, as having the God himself present among them; hoisted sail, and in a few dayes with a prosperous Voyage, crossed the Seas and arrived at Astium; where the Sea being troublesome, and their navigations hindred; the serpent which had kept it self still and quiet all the voyage, creeping out the Ship, glided to the Porch of the most eminent Church in that City, and there abode three whole dayes together: The Romans much fearing they should never draw him from thence, seeing he had not in so long time returned to his wonted sustenance; but at length having regained him with much cheerfulness they conveyed him to Rome: The whole City ran out to the sight of so incredible a wonder; on the banks of the river as he passed by many altars were erected, incense and sweet odours prepared, and sacrifices slain. They were now just come to that place, where Tibur a little dividing it self, suffereth an Island to appear in the midst of it, when the Serpent forsaking the Ship betakes himself into that Island by swimming, and was not afterwards any more seen by man; hence was the place call'd the Island of Esculapins. The Fathers all agreeing that the Gods had chosen that place, decreed a Temple to be there erected to Esculapins. The sickness whether by this remedy, or that it had otherwise run its full course did suddenly cease; the Temple was quickly enriched with many extraordinary offerings, and its renown wonderfully spread abroad by those who profess to have received help in their diseases from this God. L. Posthumius the Consul carried the same pride with him into his Province which he had exercis'd against his Colleague at home: For whereas Q. Fabius Garges, the last year's Consul, did by order from the Senate manage affairs in Samnium as Proconsul; Posthumius arrogantly writes to him commanding him to depart the Province, in as much as himself was sufficient to wage that War. Fabius answering with the Decree of the Fathers, and that it was not safe for him to desert a business imposed on him by the Senate; the Romans upon this news feared left by the discord of the Commanders, the Common-wealth would be dampnified: Wherefore 'twas thought fit to send Legates to the Consul, to desire in the Senates name that Fabius might be suffer'd to continue with the Army in Samnium. Posthumius having returned an absurd and broken Answer; added withall a speech of singular impudence: That during his Consulship, he was not obliged to obey the Senate, but they him; and that his actions might correspond with his words, forthwith dismissing the Legates, he marcheth with his Army to Cominium, which City Fabius did then besiege; resolving (if by no other means he could) by fight to remove his Rival: The Roman Armies had afforded the enemy a foul spectacle, if Fabius had resisted with the same he was assaulted; but he being better temper'd both by nature and his Fathers documents departed the Province, having profess'd that he yielded not to the Consuls fury, but to the good of the Common-wealth. Posthumius in a few dayes reduced Cominium, whence leading his Army to Venusia, and taking that also, he carried about the War to other Towns; many whereof partly by force, partly by treaty were brought under his power. In this Expedition ten thousand of the enemies were slain, six thousand two hundred casting down their arms, yielding themselves to the mercy of the conquerours. The Consuls achievements were no way contemptible, but the grace of them were spoiled by his pride and Insolence: Wherefore when he did by Letters advise the Fathers that the City and Territory of Venusia was very convenient for a Colony therein to be planted, the counsel indeed was accepted, but without mention made of the Author of the Victory and the counsels, other men had the conduct of the Colony of twenty thousand men; for so I find it in Authors of no small credit: A great number indeed and almost exceeding belief, but that it seems reasonable, that in the midst of Nations, yet un subdued they should think of placing a considerable force, as a double guard both against the Apulians and the Lucanians. Now the stubbornness of Posthumius, as besides other grudges and offences, it contradicted him much envy; so it tended much to encrease Fabius his Favour and good opinion with with all men, so, that when he came to the City, and had made relation of his performances, his triumph was readily assented unto. Being now Proconsul he did on the Calends of August make his triumph over those Samnites who are called Pentri: Old Fabius followed his Chariot on horse-back, whom the people beheld, and by their acclamations acknowledged not only an Assistant, but the author of the Victory. He accumulated all the glory of the enterprize upon the peoples Consul, using himself as the name, so the modesty of a Legate, beholding his sons honour with as much complacency, as when, being yet a little one, he did in his own triumph carry him about in his Chariot. Part of the plunder was by the Consul divided among the soldiers, the rest laid up in the Treasury, and C. Pontius the Samnite being first led in Triumph was afterward beheaded: A stout man he was and of worthy memory, who in those dayes did a long time sustain the Roman violence, gave them many considerable overthrows, but of all the most shameful one at the Caudine Spinnies: He was reported to say, That had he been reserved to those dayes wherein the Romans should have learn'd to receive money, he would no longer have suffered them to bear sway. It seems then the fortune of the City was not better defended by their industry in Arms, then their innocence of manners: In the mean time Posthumius fretting no less at the honour had been granted his Rival, then that the like had been denyed him, by weakness of mind opposing his own contumacy, to the authority of the Fathers, did both exasperate the wound of his own spirit, and imitate those imaginations against him, which ought by modesty of speech and carriage to have been asswaged. He abstained not from complaints against his enemies, nor from reproaches against the Senate, and to spite the Fathers, he distributed the whole prey among the souldiers, and disbanded his army before a successor could be sent him. He triumphed likewise contrary to the pleasure of the Senate, which, though some refer to his second Consulship, I believe more fitly agrees with this conjuncture, and it is so affirmed by authors of no mean credit in Histories: By these doings he drew new hatred upon himself, and he was no sooner out of office, but the two Tribunes of the people upon a set day accused him. Besides what hath hitherto been mentioned, 'twas objected against him, that before he march'd armed out of the City, he employed two thousand choice men out of his Legions to dig up a piece of ground, and detained them many days in this work, not remembering they were his souldiers, not his slaves, and were laiev'd to enlarge the Publicke Land, not to manure his. Being earnestly press'd with these Crimes, and in vain striving to clear himself, he was by the suffrage of all the Tribes condemned; his suit was valued to stand him in two hundred thousand pieces of money. Now P. Cornelius Rufinus, and M. Curius Dentatus entered their Consulships. Each of these with his Legions did utterly wast Samnium, depopulating their grounds, and ruining their Cities, and in many set battels having the upper hand compell'd them at length to sue for peace, for having in so many battels lost the prime of their Youth; and in Pontius the chief counsel and conduct, they did by their Embassadors sent first to the Consul, and by their leave to Rome, obtain that now this fourth time a League might be renewed with them. 'Tis likely too the Romans even weary with beating, were willing to conclude a difficult and miserable War, with the tranquility of a certain peace. I find the war with the Samnites to have begun when M. Valerius was the third time Consul. A. Cornelius Cossus being his Colleague, and being through four and fifty Consulships, with various success continued (only by some shortliv'd truces suspended) it held both parties in play with much trouble and vexation; whether Cornelius triumphed for this War is uncertain; as for Manius there is no doubt, for his fortune being more eminent in that he subdued other enemies, he Triumphed twice in the same Consulship: For the Sabines a Warlike Nation, now grown wealthy with a long peace, whether they were moved with their own proper compassion, and Entreaties of the Samnites; or whether willing timely to prevent those miseries, which (having swallowed up their neighbours) they foresaw approaching to themselves, having put their young men into Arms, invaded some places under the Roman Jurisdiction: Against these did Curius lead forth his Army, and that he might both divert the enemies, and give the Sabines some tastes of the miseries of War, he sent part of his forces by privy journies into their territories with instruction, that spreading themselves as much as could be, bringing terror and vastation on every place: This straight did soon dissolve the formidable Army of the Sabines, several troupes running several wayes to the defence of their own substance; so that the Consul had an easie Victory over the disperd forces. In this Expedition they proceeded as far as the Adriatique Sea, gaining the possession of so much ground, and so many men, as the saying of Curius began to be famous, who (according to the genius of those times being more ready in deeds then in words) when he could not express every singular circumstance, in gross express'd himself, That he had taken so much ground, it must needs have turned into wilderness, but that he had taken a proportionable number of men; and that he had taken so many men, they must of necessity have perished with hunger, but that he had taken a proportionable extent of ground. When the Sabines sued for peace, not only that was afforded them, but likewise the Freedome of the City, (though without the suffrage of the Tribes) this favour was in memory of their old Affinity under Tatius, the late War not being carried on with any malignant hatred. Of the next years Consulship (underwent by M. Valerius Corvinus, and Q. Cadius Neftus) we have arriv'd to little understanding; onely I find some Colonies about this time deduced to Castrum, eo Adria (from whence the Sea taketh its name) and to Sena in Gallia: Nevertheless considering those Regions were not as yet to such a purpose sufficiently settled, I think fit rather to incline to other Authors who refer the beginning of those Colonies to after-times: But in the City for restraining many villanies and outrages daily committed, there was a new Magistracy constituted under the name of Capital Triumvirs, who were appointed Judges and Moderators to take cognizance of offences, to imprison the guilty, and, when occasion was, to inflict punishments.

The words of the Law in that case made by L. Papirius, Tribune of the people, I find to be these, Whoever shall hereafter be Prator to give Judgment among the Citizens, let him require of the people three Capital men, and those three men, whoever shall be chosen, let them exact sacraments, let them judge, let them be of equal authority, as by the Laws and decrees of the people they ought to Exact, to Judge, and to Be. In which clause commission is likewise given of requiring Mulets or Fines, for in those dayes that piece of mony which was disbursed by way of punishment, was called a Sacrament, because (the publick sacrifices being many, and the Treasury but low) it was destin'd to be expended in sacrifices.

Of the Taxes that year, there is no other memory left, but that two hundred seventy three thousand Citizens were rated. That this years Censors did likewise choose Q. Fabius Maximus Prince of the Senate, there is a likely conjecture, which is otherwise confirmed, for that honour did constantly remain in three of that Family successively; as for example, Maximus received it from Ambustus his father, and transmitted it to his son Gurgus. While affairs were in a good state abroad, they were troubled with discord and sedition at home. The Commonalty being far in debt required a general discharge by publick authority for all debts and bonds passed aforetime, without any satisfaction; this was an old device, and for two hundred years and upwards variously agitated, even as any turbulent Tribune should exasperate them, or the Extortion of Usurers move their indignation. Under the former Consuls, the fear either of the Pestilence or the Enemy did smother these contentions in some measure; but Q. Marcius Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina being Consuls, and the year ensuing M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Nautius Rutilus bearing office, they broke out most violently, for the appeasing whereof, more then for any other occasion, a Dictator was created, whom I take to be Appius Claudius, who was afterwards surnamed Cacus, in as much as among ancient monuments I find him to have been Dictator.

Besides the harshness of unconscionable usury, the villanous lust of C. Plotius added fire to the peoples minds now already hotly disposed, causing them the sooner and more vehemently to break out into flame. T. Veturius (the son of that Veturius who being Consul was delivered up to the Samnites for an unworthy League made with them) by reason of his domestick calamities, overcharged with debt and not able to pay, was forced to yield himself slave to Plotius, patiently performing all servile duties. Plotius not content to have reduced to this base condition a young man of excellent Beauty, of a Consular Family, and likewise of great hopes, did moreover attempt to corrupt his Chastity, having before deprived him both of Estate and Liberty.

Dionysius.
Liv. 8. 28

But Veturius disdainig and resolving to suffer any thing rather then commit so horrid a wickedness, was with most grievous stripes tormented, whereupon he thrust himself forth into the publick, and being by the multitude conducted to the Consul's Tribunal, he complains of the cruelty and lust of his Creditor, shewing withal the bunches and fresh marks of the lasses. The Consuls therefore judging it a business not to be neglected, informed the Senate thereof, where upon sentence past, Plotius was condemned to prison, and by a Law in that case established, All men whosoever through the whole City had bound themselves slaves for debt, were set at liberty. I am not ignorant that instead of T. Veturius some Authors make mention of Publius the son of a Colonel, who was one of the contrivers of the Caudine peace. Forty years before this, for the like cause, was a Law made for the annulling such Indentures; nevertheless the Usurers growing so hard-hearted, and the former Law, by the patience of Debtors (refusing nothing in the midst of their penurie) being by degrees neglected, 'twas though fit they should be admonished by so fresh an example to provide more full and diligent caution for the future. But the people desiring to be freed not only from their Indentures, but from the Extortion of Use mony, were not satisfied with that Law though favourable to their revengeful minds. And (as in some more acute diseases, the pain is rather intended by a gentle application of medecines then remitted) not long after the matter was so Exulcerated, that when the Tribunes of the people with their greatest endeavours contended for a Law concerning Letters of Protection from Creditors, and that the Creditors did with equal force and animosity resist: The Commonalty after the example of their Ancestors, quitting the City, retired cross the water to Mount Janiculum; resolving never, without obtaining their request, to return to their own household-Gods. The Consuls finding little remedy against this combustion (M. Valerius Potitus, and C. Atilius Patinus are thought then to be Consuls) they were fain to flie to the last refuge in distressed times, and create a Dictator, who was Q. Hortensius; he applying what the Time and the Cause seemed to require, and understanding the main breach of peace to consist in this, That the people were sensible of the violation of their Decrees, and the Publilian Law, thought fit to yield to the times, (though many strove against this opinion) and by a new Law made in the Esculete; he diligently provided, That whatsoever the Commonalty should ordain, all the Romans should be obliged unto. With these Lenitives the people being reduc'd to concord, and returned to their own houses, the Dictator, either by the sudden force of his disease, or overwearied with care care and pains, dyed during the time of his Magistracy, which had hapned to none before. Henceforward for a while there was less dissention at Rome; but the Dignity of the Empire began insensibly to decrease, inasmuch as the Commons not being guarded against the fraudulent proceedings of Ambitious men, and yet earnest to manifest their authority, accepted of any motions, and decreed many things tending to the disgrace of the Publick, and at last struck at the very Foundation. A singular Lesson to those who are invested with the guidance of affairs, seeing the vulgar, if their own private business proceed fairly, seldom meddle with things of an higher nature, not to provoke them by injuries and oppressions of great ones to aspire to a Dominion they know not how to manage. About this time I believe was the Law made concerning suffrages, which the Fathers, to the danger of their own Courts, were fain to authorize. For hitherto it had prevailed that no man executed any magistracy by the peoples votes, unless the Senate assented thereunto.

Livie 1. 17

The Improvident vulgar did for some time contain themselves within their former bounds, and though they seldom contradicted the Fathers Sentences, yet they were always feared as having power to do so. But then Marius the Tribune made a Law whereby the peoples Authority was much augmented, but the wholesome, and honourable severity of the Senate much weakened. Q. Hortensius the Dictator being dead, some report another was chosen to administer affairs, to wit, Q. Fabius Maximus; if so, this was his third Dictatorship. L. Volturnus, C. F. C. N. is said to have been Master of his horse. For there was war at this time with the Volturnians of the Etruscan Nation, which was very seasonable to clear Rome of the sedition, and those who retained the spirit of the former Discord. There was likewise occasion found of waging war with the Lucanians, who being troublesome neighbours, had by many injuries compelled the Thurines (a City of that part of Italy called Great Greece) to betake themselves to the Roman Protection: And C. Atilius the Tribune propounding a War against the Lucanians, the people decreed it. The armies therefore were drawn into the field, and in each place things performed, the memories whereof, with the Annals of those who wrote them, is perished. The Thurines bestowed on C. Atilius a statue and Crown of gold. Next follows the Consulship of C. Claudius Canina, and M. Aemilius Lepidus, whereof no memorable thing is delivered to posterity, only the Etruscan and Lucanian war seem to have been still in being. There is also on Record an Oration of Cicero concerning the Lucanians, which is to be referred to one of his four Triumphs, for so often I find he Triumphed. But in what year, or with what Magistracy invested, he managed those affairs is uncertain.

But things of greater weight were now impending, which were attended with a very considerable slaughter; for a war was now waged against the Senones a people of Gauls. They had often waite and often peace with the Romans; and now, after their last overthrow in the fields of Sentinus, where, Ducius having devoted himself to Death, a great Number of their men were slain, had lien still for almost ten years; Only they had suffered their young men to be hired by the Etruscans against the Romans. But now marching into Etruria, with a greater power then they had usually done, they Besieged Arretium. Now the Arretines had before this requested a league with the Romans, which being denied they did nevertheless obtaine a Truce, whose Terme was not yet expired. But herein did their chiefest Hope of succour consist, because the Romans always thought it mainly concerned them to have the Gauls beaten. Wherefore sending Embassadors to Rome they craved assistance against the common enemy. In the mean time the year was gone about wherein C. Servilius Tullia and Lucius Cassius Mucius were Consuls, in stead of Cassius some annals mention Cassius. But the lesser Nobility of the Cassian family is thought not to have attained the Consular dignity till the year from the foundation of the City six hundred and sixtie.

Corneilius Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius Calvinus being Consuls, when the Terror of the Gallique warre began again to move it selfe, and news was brought that many of the Tuscans had joyned forces with the Senones, the Fathers thought the Danger of the Aretines a thing not to be neglected by them: And because they could neither recall Dolabella from the Volfinians, nor Domitius out of Lucania without great hindrance to their affaires, The Fathers ordain L. Cæcilius Metellus the last yeares Consull, and new Prætor, with all haste to Leavy an army, and raise the siege of Aretium; Nevertheless left the warre should seem to be rashly undertaken, they thought fit to send Embassadors before, to Declare that Aretium was under the Roman Protection, and that the Gaules being in League with them would do more justly, if they would not lead their Army against their Friends and Companions. The message being proclaim'd among the Senones, Britomaris a fierce young man of the Royall Blood, whose Father had been slain by the Romans amongst the Etrurian auxiliaries, burning with desire of Revenge, caused not only the men, but the Ensignes of their sacred Office to be hewne and torne in Pieces. The Rumour of so horrid a fact being related in Rome and in the Camp of Dolabella, their minde was vehemently incensed, and warre proclaim'd against the Senones, and Dolabella forthwith leaveth the Etrurians, marcheth with his Army through the Sabine, and Picenians territorys with very long journeys into the Countrey of the Senones, who terrified with this sudden Invasion, now in the absence of their main strength, taking the field with a small and inconsiderable body were easily routed and overcome. The Consull giving the Enemy no Breath, Burnes up his Townes, demolisheth his Buildings, wasteth the whole land, and having slain the youth and carried away the weaker multitude of Women and Children left very little signe that ever that Countrey had been inhabited by Mankind. Britomaris himselfe being taken and punished with various and exquisite Torments was reserved for the Triumph. At the same time things succeeded not so prosperously at Aretium; For L. Cæcilius Metellus had ill fortune in his fight before the Town with the Senones and Etrurians, seven Colonells with many other men of Note, together with the Prætor himself were slain, and of their Legions and Auxiliaries about Thirteen Thousand were wanting.

But the Joy for this victory prevailed not so much with the Gaules, as sorrow and Conternation for the Lamentable Desolation of their Countrey; Wherefore gathering together all their Countrey men then in Armes in Etruria, full of Grief and Anger, void of counsell and hope, having no habitation whereto to be received at home, (I know not what Fate drawing them to their destruction) in a heat of Resolution they drive toward Rome, thus Computing, That there is no other way to recompence the desolation of their own Countrey, but by forcing the Romans to see the like Ruine of their City, That their Spirits and Forces were now no whit inferior to, nor the cause of their March from Aretium of less importance, then that of their Ancestours who marched from Clusium of the same Etruria and took Rome: With the like speeches incensing themselves they Rush on, by nature impatient of Delay, and now hasty in their Counsels, that they might overwhelme their Enemies unawares; But travelling through an Enemies Countrey, they met with many obstacles, so that the Romans had Leisure to provide against this Fury. At length wandring through unknown and unfriendly places, guided by no certaine Line, they light upon Domitius the Consull, and immediately joyne Battell with him; But their unhappy rashness confounded both their Reason and Discipline: many being slaine in Battell, the Residue growing mad with Rage and despaire sheathed in their own Bowells, those weapons they had in vain drawn against the Enemy. Insomuch as so sudden and vehement a Judgement overtook a late most flourishing People for their villany in murdering Embassadors, that in the space of few months they were totally cut off, and ceased any more to be numbred among Nations, whose laws they had violated and Transgressed: For even the small Remnant of the Senones who had betaken themselves to their Neighbours, and Kinsmen the Boii, were the next year by Dolabella the Consull with an universal slaughter clean swept away. For whereas the Boians and Etrurians were involv'd in these late disasters, and possessed with fear of the same Calamities, they were at the Lake called Vadimonis in a set Battell overcome, many of the Etrurians slain, few of the Boians escaped, the very name of the Senones so utterly extinct, that that there is not thought to be left alive one Man of that Nation which had set Rome on fire. About this time I think it more probable that the Colony was planted in Sena, the Romans having now an entire possession of their Countrey, and quite taken away their Name out of that part of Italy. Nevertheless the Etrurians and the Boians next year recruiting their army with young men now grown up, ventred once more to try the Fortune of a Battell. Then it was I believe by Q. Amilius Papus that they were beaten, for his and C. Fabricius his first Consulship hapned that year, and 'tis certain the Province of Etruria fell to Papus by Lot. But in most Annalls yet extant, the Memory of these Transactions is swallowed up by the Intervening of greater matters. For whereas the Romans had by so many continuall fights and victories very mightily encreased their Virtue and Power, all the free Cities and Nations in Italy being brought into feare, conspired in a great and most dangerous warre; joyning together all their Counsells and forces as against a Common Enemy, and Plunderer. Neither thought they fit any longer to deferre their Designe, while now the Remnant of the Boians and Etrurians sufficed to distract the Roman Powers. And first of all the Samnites, again breaking their League and openly joyning force with the Lucanians and Brutians, commenced the Warre. But these were overcome by C. Fabricius in many pitch'd fields; especially in one most remarkable when they joyn'd Battell near the City of the Thurines, which Statius Statilius had again streightly besieged; where the Enemy was with a very great slaughter beaten, and their Camp likewise forced and taken. It is reported that while the camp was strenuously defended, A young man of large proportion of Body was seen to bring Ladders to the works, whereby the Romans being animated obtained a complete victory. Twenty Thousand are said to be slain in the fight and in the Camp, Five thousand together with the General taken Prisoners, and twenty Colours. The next day the Consull resolving to reward those whose valour had been eminent, and promising a CORONA VALLARIS to him who first entered the Enemies Camp. After diligent Enquiry made after the man, the souldier was not to be found (if so be he were a souldier) who would claime this Honour; 'Twas therefore believed and voiced abroad that Mars was the Author of this feat, and the Cause of Victory; And by the Consull's order supplication was made unto him, which the souldiers with Laurels on their heads performed with great Joy and Gladness. The Tarentines had not as yet assisted the Accomplices with any open aid; for though they were the Principal Authors of the Confederacy, yet they thought it wiser to let the Roman forces be provoked and the Fortune of warre tried with other men's danger then their own. But this Dissimulation served not their purpose, for a meer accident provoking the Rashness of the Giddy rabble betrayed all their Counsells. Even at this Time, that part of the Italian shore, after the Manner of the Gracians (by whom Tarentum and most of the other Cities were builded) did excessively delight themselves with fights, and stage playes: The Tarentines above others were most Luxurious in this kind, insomuch as it is said they had more Feasts and Solemn Playes then Dayes in the Yeare. It hapned they were then set at their sports in the greater Theatre by the Haven side, when L. Valerius (some say Cornelius) one of the Admiralls of the seas was descryed entring the Haven with ten Roman Vessels, A Fatall Error to both Parties. For the Romans ignorant of all things betook themselves thither as to a friendly and amicable shore; the Tarentines on the other side Conscious of their own Privy practises interpreted this Navy to be sent with an hostile Intention. There was then present one Philocharis whom for his loose Conversation the Citizens call'd Thais; He mentioning the articles of some former Leagues, said it was not lawfull for the Romans to saile past the Promontory of Lacinium, that therefore they should go out and meet the fool-hardy Barbarians, and suppress their Pride with a Mischiefe. The giddy Rout besotted with continual drinkings, manifest their assent by Acclamation, so that one scandalous persons opinion in a matter of so great importance was generally received, and without further Consideration they take up armes, and assault the Ships: The Romans as not dreaming of any such Encounter, being utterly unprepar'd to fight, betook themselves to flight. The Tarentines swiftly pursuing, Five ships onely made their Escape; as many being hemm'd about were brought into the haven, whereof Four with the Admirall were drown'd and one taken, The Men, as many as were of age and strength fit for Warre, were slaine, the rest made slaves. Presently with the same vanity they began warre against the Thurines, accusing them, That the Romans came into these parts by their meanes, who though they were Gracians, had yet in the time of their distress chosen a Barbarous Nation to be their Protector, rather then the Tarentines their Neighbours and Kinsmen. The City is taken and plundred, the Chief men cast out and banish'd, and the Roman Garrison compounding for their own safety are dismissed. The Romans hearing the Newes, were according to the Greatness of the Injury most exceedingly incens'd, yet thought it not convenient at that season to undertake a new warre: An Embassy was decreed to complain of the Outrage, and instruction was given the Legates to Require, That the Captives should be set at Liberty, the Thurines goods or the just value of them should be restor'd, the Exiles call'd back, and the Authors of these Misdemeanours deliver'd into the hands of the Romans. The Tarentines according to the Greeke Custome were wont to assemble their People together in the Theatre; whether the Embassadors being with much Difficulty admitted, they find a Rabble-rout totally debauch'd with Drunkenness and Idleness, for this likewise was a great Holiday with the Tarentines. There when L. Posthumus the Prince Legate began to declare his message, he was entertained with such mocks and scoffs of the wanton multitude, that he carried home greater causes of hatred than he came to complain of. For they had him in such contempt, that not regarding any thing else he spoke; when, as being a Roman, he chanced to pronounce any word not so exactly according to the Greek manner, the whole company would burst out into laughter, crying out upon him and reviling him as a Barbarian, they jeer'd and flouted at the Habit of the Embassadors, for they came in their gowns, and at last fairly thrust them out of doors, in vain claiming the privilege of the Laws of Nations. Now, what is scarce fit to be spoken, but may prove of good example to curb the insolence of popular license, it is reported, That as the Embassadors pressed through the croud of the Tarentines out of the Theatre, a certain Buffoon, one Philonides (for in this the Tarentines were beholding to their good manners, the Names of their jesters were recorded in their Annals, though their Princes were forgotten) like an impudent Dog, piss'd upon the sacred Vestments of the Embassadors. This might seem the crime of one only mad furious fellow, but that forthwith the whole drunken society did own it, and the whole Theatre resounded with laughter, and clappings of the hands, as approving the fact. Posthumius lifting up his voice, We accept this, O men, O jester (saith he) seeing ye bestow those things upon us we required not at your hands. And when he turned himself to the multitude shewing his defiled garment, they renew'd their laughter, and began to dance, singing scurrilous and reproachful Verses against the people of Rome, wherefore Posthumius again crying out, Laugh on, saith he, laugh on, Tarentines, while ye may, for hereafter ye shall weep sufficiently: Whereat the Tarentines being nettled, Nay, saith he, to vex you the more, I tell you before hand, this garment shall cost you much blood the washing. After this, receiving no other answer, they sailed home. Now at Rome, L. Aemilius Barbula, and Q. Marcius Philippus, had begun their Consulship, by whom the Senate being convened, and the Robe defiled, as it was, being shew'd by the Embassadors, who declared to the Fathers the whole series of affronts and indignities heaped on them by the Tarentines: Their spirits were in an high manner incensed, and not so much as any scruple made of vindicating their reproach by Arms. But because they had already to deal with so many mighty Nations, they could not resolve whether now immediately, or hereafter to send an Army against the Tarentines, and the debate continued many dayes even from morning till night: Some were of opinion, That nothing should be enterprized before the other Cities, at least those near Tarentus were reduced; others contended, That the war should incontinently be commenced; at last, numbring their votes, it was decreed, That the business of the Tarentine war should be refer'd to the people.

The people with an unanimous consent agreed upon the War, and accordingly letters were sent to Aemilius the Consul, who was then gone to the Army into Samnium; That omitting all things at present, he should pitch his Camp in the Tarentine Fields, and, unless he could procure satisfaction for the injuries received, that he should prosecute them with a just and holy War. The Tarentines perceiving they had now no longer to deal with a few unarmed men, but a just and well order'd Army, rousing themselves out of their accustom'd sottishness, began seriously to enter into counsel, what was to be done; to accept of the war was dangerous, to do what the Romans required in satisfaction was base, and to avoide both impossible: While their opinions were thus doubtful, one among the rest stood up and said, Why do we thus, O Tarentines, waste the time in vain altercations? the times are come which require Deeds rather than Words, which that they may be order'd to the publick benefit, there is need of free Speech and sincere Counsel. Neither am I much moved that heretofore, by a strange disease incident to Free Cities, ye have been delighted with flattering and sugar'd Orations, though of ill consequence, because then, as in time of Prosperity, ye regarded not much what mainly tended to the good of the Commonwealth: But now the Roman Army is upon our Borders, and the fear of the enemy before our Gates, and this is sufficient to instruct us to prefer what is Profitable before what is Pleasing. Neither would I have you so interpret me, as if I stood up to bit you in the teeth with past misdemeanors; for unreasonably to object old crimes is the part of an enemy, and one who wantonly insults over others infirmities: And an honest man that is careful of the common safety, will hide and excuse the faults of his City, unlesse the remembrance of them be of concernment to the avoiding some publick Calamity. For seeing we are but men, to pretend freedom from all error, would argue too much Pride: But often to fall at the same stone, and not to grow wiser when the very event plainly chastiseth our rashness, is not consistent with right reason. We have at one man's warning assaulted and drown'd the Roman ships, and presently with open war vexed our Kinsmen the Thurines, because they had rather be protected by the Romans, then swallowed up by the Lucanians and Brutians; moreover, we have suffered shameful indignities to be cast on the Roman Embassadors; so that a war we might have avoided, a heavy dangerous war we are not provided for, hath in a most unlucky time overtaken us. Finally, the Roman Camps are now pitch't in our fields, and we as yet wavering in our counsel, deliberate still whether it be safer to accept a formidable war, or make a dishonourable peace. And I would to God at length, that laying aside all self flattery, and forgetting self-interest, and aiming at the publick honour and profit, we might freely and truly consult together, there might certainly a way be found of making an honest league, or a safe war. But now I see you clearly divided into two parts, I may say factions, not taking counsel out of judgment or as the state of things require, but every man by.

byassed by his own inclination. For how comes it to pass that so few of the young men, and poorer sort stand for peace? and why do none of the rich and ancient men desire war? what other reason can be given of so equal a division in the City, but these that would fain in quiet reap the commodity of their Lands and Usury, the other in time of war, hope for command and liberty of plunder? This is an old disease amongst us, neither of a long time hath our Commonwealth wanted such men, who even with the danger and detriment of the City have studied to increase their own private wealth. All which may happily be prevented (for I must speak what I think at present most conducible) if ye will neither buy peace on such base conditions as shall infringe the privileges of a Free City, nor yet trust singly to your own Forces in so difficult a war. Our Ancestors have often committed the conduct and command of their Armies to foreign Leaders: Either out of Peloponnesus or out of Sicilis we have sent for Archidamus the son of Agessilaus, afterward for Cleonymus, then presently for Agathocles. Even in our own memory when we were infested by our Neighbours, our Fathers made use of Alexander the Epirot: By which means they did not only themselves succeed prosperously, but left things in a flourishing condition to us. There is at this day the same friendship between us and the Epirots, neither are they now lesse potent in an Army and a Commander: And the benefit is fresh in memory, which Pyrrhus received from us, in that with our whole Navy we assisted him in his attempt against the Corcyraens. Therefore esteem this not as my counsel; but as the counsel of the wisest men who have heretofore happily governed this Commonwealth, which ye ought therefore at least to follow, because in the former example you may discern both the reason and ground, as also the issue and successe of it. And yet otherwise, there may be arguments most evident and sufficient to the same purpose; There is no man amongst us so singularly eminent, to whom all the rest will willingly submit themselves, and what danger there is in emulation, when we have to do with a fierce and potent Enemy, ye are not ignorant. And whosoever ye shall make General, either by his too great affection to peace, or by his ambition of carrying on the war, may wrong your affairs; not to say, that 'tis not safe to commit a war into the hands of any ordinary person against the Romans, an hardy stout Nation and inur'd to Arms. But the truth is, which none can doubt of, that Pyrrhus is not by any man exceeded in virtue and experience of Martial affairs. But perhaps he will not come? Certainly, being a man desirous of action, and having no other war at present, he will not only come himself, but bring a formidable strength, and that of no fresh-water souldiers. And if ye fear his encroachment upon your Liberties, ye may treat with him on such conditions as the Commonwealth may be secur'd. By this means ye may either obtain an honourable peace, or bestow a glorious one. Though indeed it be not the least of my hopes, that the Romans will rather beforehand deal with us on equal terms then admit of Pyrrhus into Italy, having heretofore feared a King of much lesse glory and renown out of the same Epirus. This counsel prevailed not only so far, as to make them see a probable way opened to the publick safety, but likewise the assembly being divided into two contrary opinions, neither part being able to prevail over the other, they did all unanimously concur in this, as seeming indifferent to both sides.

'Tis reported, when the Rumour was spread about the Citie, that a decree was made for the invitation of Pyrrhus that one Meton a covetous fellow, taking a dry wither'd chapplet upon his head, after the manner of Drunkards, together with his minstrel, entred the Theatre; the people according to their idle custome, commanded him to sing and his woman to pipe, after a while silence being made, Meton crys out, Ye doe well, O Tarentines, in that ye grant Liberty to them that please, to sing and Dance; for when Pyrrhus once comes into the Citie we shall scarce be allow'd to live after our owne minds. The People being somewhat moved at this saying, and murmurings arising: Those who were authors of the injuries against the Romans (fearing lest if peacefull Counsels prevailed they should be delivered up to punishment) having chid the people, That they would suffer themselves to be unworthily devided by a rascall fellow, forcibly thrust Meton out of the Theatre, so that afterward without contradiction the Decree was ratified. But the Roman Consul, hearing nothing from the Tarentines tending to peace, and understanding that Embassadors were sent with presents to Pyrrhus sets himself to the War, wasteth their grounds, taketh their Cities some by force, some by composition; and fills all places with losse, and terror. The Tarentines send forth forces to hinder the spoile, but, after a sharpe conflict, the Romans having the better, the Græcians are driven backe into the Citie with great losse. Then Emilius without resistance wasteth and burneth the whole Country round about. The Tarentines terrified with these calamities, (like a people, the more insolent in prosperity, the more dejected and fearefull in adversity) submit themselves to the Government of Agis, who was a constant authour of maintaining the Roman friendship. Their desire and hopes of peace were much augmented by the discourse of some prime men who were dismissed by the Consull, and declared his Humanity, With what Indulgence and clemencie he entertain'd those who were taken in severall places of the Country, or in the last fight. But the confidence of Cineas who was now come with Auxiliaries from Epirus changed their minds, and erected their spirits. For Pyrrhus being a man of vast conceits, and in emulation of Alexander the Great, comprehending large Empires in his fancy, believed now a way to be laid open to accomplish all his designs, as if the Fates themselves had invited him.

- Aug. de Civ. Dei.* 'Tis said he was much confirm'd by the Oracle of Delfos, whose words were indeed of an ambiguous sense, which yet the Kings ambition did favourably interpret. For consulting about the War he was now to undertake, Answer was made, Posse eum Romanos vincere, that he should overcome the Romans, or the Romans him. But I think his chief encouragement was from the Tarentine Embassadour who affirm'd, That out of their own Cities; with the help of the Lucanians, the Missapians, Samnites and other the confederates, they could easily raise twenty thousand horse, and three hundred and fifty thousand foot. With this strength, when he should once have brought the Romans under subjection, he hoped with little paines to attaine the Lordship of all Italy; then a short cut into Sicilie would present him with an Island much at discord and void of a Ruler (the families of Agathocles being destroyed) and this he thought he might claime by right of Inheritance, as having begotten Children on Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles; these things happily succeeding he was resolv'd to make War with the Carthaginians. 'Tis reported that Cineas, a man of excellent wisdom, willing to have the King by his own confession acknowledged that his immoderate desires, whereby the enjoyment of his present felicity was disturb'd; were in reason to be restrained, asked him, What he would doe when he had overcome the Romans? Pyrhus then declaring how one victorie would beget another, And what shall we doe, saies he, when all these things are accomplish'd? Why then, saith Pyrrhus, we will enjoy the fruits of Peace, the benefit of ease and Idleness. To which Cineas replied, And why, O King, can we not at present enjoy the same things, while they are in our hands? whereas the undertaking of new Wars may utterly deprive us of them. But a second embassy coming from the Tarentines, Pyrhus overcome by his own ambition, answer'd, That 'twas the custome of the Epirotes to wage War, not only for themselves, but for their companions and friends also. But to dissemble his more secret counsells, he articles very presely with the Embassadours, That as soon as he had reliev'd them, he should be suffer'd to returne home; and not be detain'd in Italy any longer then necessity should require. Then with all might and maine intending himselfe upon preparation for the War, he causeth a great number of long ships to be made ready, and likewise trims up others for transportation of men and horse. Now having Employed most of the Italian Embassadours (whom under a pretext of honour he detain'd as hostages and pledges), in levying and conducting of forces, he sent the rest beforehand to Tarentum, with three thousand armed men, and Cineas for Commander. By their arrival all hopes of peace were broken off, Agis his government abrogated, and by decree of the people the guidance of affairs committed to one of them who were now returned from Epirus. Not long after Milo being sent by the King, secures the Tower of Tarentum with a Garrison, and claims the custody and defence of the walls, with the very good will of the multitude, who were glad to see strangers undertake all the trouble and labour, while they safely enjoy'd their rest; they therefore chearfully decree Corn for the souldiers and Money for Pyrhus.
- In the mean time L. Aemilius understanding of the Arrivall of these beyond-sea souldiers, that he might have the safer winter quarters, resolv'd to draw his army into Lucania. His journey was by certain narrow passages shut in on the one hand with the Sea, on the other with ragged and impassible Rocks. The Tarentines having intelligence of his purpose, sail'd by that shore with their ships furnished with Cross-bows and Slings, assailing the souldiers as they pass'd through strait and open paths with stones and darts. But Aemilius, not being able to help himself by virtue, secur'd his passage by cunning; the Captives which before he had placed in the Rear, he now draws to that side of the ranks which was obnoxious to danger, in pity of whom, the Tarentines fearing to hurt their own men, spared also the enemy. These things were done at Tarentum this year. At Rome C. Fabricius Luscinus, who in his Consulship had egregiously overcome the Samnites, and Lucanians entred the Capital in Triumph. Q. Marcius not many daies after obtained the same honour, being returned out of Etruria with prosperous success. The reason why, the Etrurian war not as yet being finished, he was called out of his Province at such a time of year, (for Fabricius triumph'd the third of the Nones of March.) is not recorded. I conceive he was recall'd by the Senate, who being troubled with expectation of Pyrhus, did from every quarter gather together what strength they could. The Proletarii, the sixth and last rank of Citizens, who of old were priviledg'd from going to war, were now list'd, and being not able by reason of their poverty to provide themselves with arms, they were furnished by the publick; for at this time war being on every side commenced, it was necessary the Commonwealth should be defended by many Armies. These mens office was, while the Legions were otherwise employ'd, to guard the City with watch and ward, being disposed in several stations upon the walls, and in the Market-place. Neither by all these contrivances could the imminent calamities have been averted, but that the fortune of a City, ordain'd to Rule did in these most dangerous times produce men of so great Excellency, as I know not whether ever she could boast of better. Men, not so eminent for their Riches or Extraction, as truly ennobled by their Virtue and contempt of wealth. This Age had its Curii, Fabricii, Cornuciani, men of no great Ancestors or Possessions, but of most ample fame, which they obtained by their upright example, exact skill in Marshal affairs, and an answerable innocence of Manners; who were every where helpful to their Country, which had now need of Champions, which were able not only to resist the sword of the enemy, but to scorn his gold, having to deal with a King who was potent in both. In the meantime Pyrhus, not waiting for the spring, coming with with two and twenty Thousand foot, three thousand horse, twenty Elephants, and a considerable band of slingers and archers, was in the midst of his Voyage so tossed with a Tempest, that he narrowly escaped being cast away. For the Navy being dispersed, and most of the ships distressed, when the Admirall was in danger, Pyrrhus leapt into the sea, and with very great paines at length hardly swam to shoare: But the strength and spirit of his minde did much helpe the weakness of his Body, together with the diligence of the Messapians, on whose shoare he was cast, who with all offices of humanity did foment and cherish him: with their assistance likewise, some few ships, which had escaped the violence of the storme, being brought into the Haven, there were gathered together some few horse, with two Elephants, and under two thousand footmen, with this force he marched to Tarentus, being met by Cineas who came forth with his souldiers to conduct him thither, and being entertained with much joy he took his rest for some dayes; In which space having observed the Manners of the City to be so order'd, that unless they were amended, there was no possibility of protecting it, but that rather the Patrons themselves would likewise be undone by it, he took no open notice at the present. But a while after, his dispersed ships meeting together, when he had strength sufficient, he shut up their wrestling places, and Porches, where the idle youth use to spend whole dayes in walking and fooling; he forbade their Banquets and Drinking-matches, and reduced their solemn Games from Intemperancy to a just Mediocrity.

After this he made a very strict Leavy of their young men, commanding his Prefers to choose out those of the larger size, he would make them valiant; Mixing these among his own Companies, lest being apart they should prove seditious, he trains them up with the same hardness and severity of Discipline, threatening pain of Death on those who should fly from their Colours. Those who were not in armes he compell'd to be most part of the day in the Market-place; by which strange usage the Citizens borne and bred up in shameful Luxury were grievously perplexed, calling it a slavery to be thus served against their wills, choosing rather to perish with idleness and Lust. The offence was aggravated by the Insolence of some of the King's Guard who choosing Quarters at their own pleasure, possessed them against the will of their Landlords, using much license towards their Wives and Children. Wherefore many being wearied out, forsook the City, and settled themselves in the Country, till at length that likewise was forbidden, the Ports being shut, and guards appointed. Then indeed the Tarentines perceiv'd that in stead of a Companion they had got a Master, and what onely Comfort was left them, when they had any handson occasion of meeting, they bewailed their Condition with indignation and Complaints, and then more freely, when besides their other Passion, they were heated with Wine; There wanted not those who inform'd Pyrrhus of this, and some of them being sent for, were accus'd for having spoken dishonourably of their King at their Banquets; But one Man's simple and ingenuous Confession freed them all from Punishment, for saies he, we said these words indeed, and should have said worse but that we wanted Wine; whereat Pyrrhus smiling, dismiss them, being willing the fault should be imputed to the wine rather then to the men; But not confiding either in the Mindes or manners of the City, what men he observed to be of greatest Note for Authority or Counsell amongst them, he either found or made some Cause arise to send them to his Son Proton (who being then fifteen yeares of Age he had left Viceroy in his Realme) others by secret Ambush he cut off, and some to make them suspected to the People, he did with much seeming Humanity embrace, as if he held them among his dearest Friends. Of this number was Aristarchus a principal Man much beloved of the Citizens, and of great repute for his Eloquence, Pyrrhus perceiving him to be very Popular, upon a certain emergent Occasion commands him to faile into Epirus. Aristarchus (knowing it was present Death to disobey the King; and that to obey him was, though not of so sudden, yet of a certain ill Consequence) taking ship, after he had sailed a little way, steer'd his course to Rome, where being received into credit, he inform'd the Senate of many Affaires of great Concernment: While Pyrrhus thus busied himselfe at Tarentus, the Romans were no less careful in making Leavys for the warre, they had raised Money, and sent Fabius to their Confederate Cities, either by his Authority or Grace to restrain them from Innovation in State: Those who were most suspected were kept in awe by Garrisons conveniently placed amongst them. For the strength of so many Nations combining themselves against one Commonwealth, and their expectation of so Warlike a King, had very much moved the humours of the Italians who were either desirous of Change, or provoked with the perswasion of Injuries receiv'd; which made the Romans the more diligent to provide for their own safety by a timely suppressing all Occasions of sedition. About this Time an Accident befell the Prænestines Nobles very remarkable, for they being brought to Rome late in the Evening were for Custody's sake lock't up in the Publick Treasury, whereby at length they understood the Deceit of an Oracle, which they did make use of to stirre up their Countrymen to Rebellion, often averring, it was Decree'd by the Fates, That the Roman Treasury should be possessed by the Prænestines. The Fathers being already much perplexed, had further Intelligence that Fabius was detained by their Confederate and Compagnions as a Pledge to secure the safe return of their hostages from Rome, and that Embassadors were sent to incite the Etrurians, the Umbres and the Gauls against the People of Rome; where at they were infinitely troubled as at a fact in it selfe horrid, so of ill Example, left in such a Dangerous time the Roman faith and honesty should be call'd in question, and held suspected by all all the Italians. In the utmost part of the Italian shoate over against Sicilie is seated the City of Rhegium, (by a Græcian name so called) very wealthy and flourishing in those dayes: The Citizens thereof judging by the Arrival of Pyrrhus that a great and terrible warre would ensue, and frighted likewise with the Carthaginian Navy floating up and down in those seas, not trusting in their own strength, thought fit to send for a Guard from Rome. The Romans sent them Four thousand souldiers (which being leavied out of the Colonies of Campania, were call'd the Campanian Legion) under the Conduct of Decius Jubbellius their Colonel; These at their first coming were very faithfull, and very diligent in defending the City. At length seeing no warre approach neer them, and being by degrees debauch'd with idleness and imitation of the Greek Customes, they began to compare the Advantage they had now in their hands with the hard and laborious life they had hitherto led; and with much Covetousness and Envy did frequently discourse in all their meetings and quarters of the convenient situation of the City, and the happiness of the Inhabitants. Decius was well pleased with this, who being himself grown as Licentious, had long ago conceived an inward desire of seizing upon the City. The design was favour'd by occasion of the present warre, which so wholly took up the Romans that they had no Leisure to mind the affaires of Rhegium; Besides on the opposite shore were the Mamertines, an Example of the like successfull villany, and ready no doubt to defend the like Treachery in others, especially being tyed with the Relation of the same Common Country; For they likewise were of Campania, and of late yeares going to warre amongst the Auxiliaries of Agathocles, and being entertained by the Messenians as Friends, having slain and cast out the Citizens, possess'd the place themselves: sharing likewise among themselves their houses, wives and Estates. They called to mind also the Campanians of old, who by the like wicked art got Capua from the Tuscans. When they had now agreed upon the Business, there was nothing left to be consulted on, but only the Manner, how safely to execute their Design, left in so populous a Citie, the lesser number should be surrounded and slain by the greater. Decius counterfeited Letters as wrote from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, to betray the Roman Garrison to him; these Letters as if they were intercepted, are read to the souldiers in private, Decius bitterly complaining of the Perfidiousness of the Rhegians; and some souldiers being subborned to it, cry out, 'Twas time to provide for their own safety by the sword, and turn that Destruction which was destin'd to them upon the heads of the Authors; and as the business was set, a Messenger comes in with newes, That Pyrrhus his Navy was seen by the shore, and secret discourses were had between him and the Rhegians. The souldiers now beside their former Covetousness, were much incensed with the Treachery of the Enemy, and fear of Danger; It is therefore by Common Consent resolv'd upon, That as the Townesmen shall be oppressed unawares and unprepar'd, that having slain the Men, with their Publick and Private wealth of the City shall be distributed to the Legion. Behold now an unworthy and horrid fact; Decius having invited some of the Prime men to Supper, against the holy Rites of Hospitality, takes away their Lives; others were every where slain in their own houses; the greater part of the Rhegians being thus murthered, the rest were banished their Country, even by those whom of late they had entertain'd under the Name of Friends and Companions, for preservation of themselves and their Country. Execution being done, there is now a new face of Publick affaires; the houses and Estates of the poore wretches like the Plunder of an Enemy, is divided amongst the Thieves; and while the Blood is yet fresh and warme, the Matrons and Virgins are forced to Marry the murtherers of their husbands and Parents; and the Cruel Perfidious Legion arrogates to it selfe the Title and Rights of the City of Rhegium. But it hath pleased God well to provide for Mankind, that such rare examples of high Mischiefe should prove likewise as manifest Examples of Vengeance and Divine Justice; Left we should onely by consideration of the success be animated to the like Villany, and not by the Issue and event be deterr'd from evil doing, so that no true Felicity attends the Wicked, neither can there be a greater Madnes then for any man to perswade himself that he can grow happy by doing Mischief: For suppose there were no Punishment after Death, which all wise men acknowledg to be the greatest, (for the folly of ordinary men is so great they will scarce believe what is before their eyes, much less be moved with the terrour of things unseen and as farre off,) yet let all things as to outward shew succeed prosperously, nevertheless the Conscience of offences committed, doth by secret wounds continually lacerate and torment the minde: the Name of the Living, and the memory of the Dead is had in perpetual hatred and Detestation among men: and what is by ill meanes gotten, and with care and labour preserved is most commonly to their great grief snatch't away again, neither God nor men suffering Wickedness to go long unpunished. It will not be amiss briefly to relate the punishment of Decius Jubbellius, and his mad Accomplices, as in these dayes it befell, for their Final destruction after great variety of troublesome Chances, was deferred to the Tenth year, as shall in fit time be declared. These Rascalls did not long enjoy Comfort or Tranquility amongst themselves; The feare of the Romans and Pyrrhus they did indeed avoid, as by reason of the present Conjuncture of Affaires, so by holding strict society with the Mamertines, and resolving to Offend neither Party: For 'twas thought safest in their first beginnings to abstain from warre at the present, while their New City which had so violent and sudden an Original, should have time to strengthen, compact and knit it selfe well together; they saw that without Danger they could not molest the King, and were in hopes the more readily to obtain Pardon from the Romans, if they bore not arms against them. The first cause of dissension, as is usual among Thieves, arose from an unequal division of the Plunder. Decius in the sedition was cast out and betook himself to Messana, the Souldiers at Rhegium chose M. Casius his Secretary for their Commander, and Decius carrying with him a great bank of money, was honour'd with the same dignity by the Mamertines, though his fortune was neither prosperous nor of continuance. For it hapned, that being troubled with sore eyes, he caused some Eminent Physician to be sought out for him; the Divine Vengeance hereby overtaking the wicked man with most sharp and bitter punishments: A Physician was therefore brought unto him, who prov'd to be by birth a Rhegian, but because he had lived so long at Messana, his original was not only unknown to Decius, (who would never have trusted himself to the mercy of a Rhegian) but likewise to most of the inhabitants of the City.

He being mindfull of his Country and resolving now to be revenged for its Calamities, perswaded Decius that the remedie he brought, was indeed strong in Operation, but of quick and most certaine efficacy: So applying the medicine which he had temper'd with the Juice of Cantharides, and giving order it should not be removed till he returned to the Patient, without delay he taketh ship, and flyeth from Messana. Decius being along time sufficiently tormented with incredible paines, seeing his Physician came not at him commanded the Medicament to be removed, which being washed off, he perceived himself to be starke blind. So that being now a blind Exul, infamous and dispaisd, he is reserved to judgement, as if he were bound in Chaines, by a wonderfull Method of Divine Vengeance, in that he received this Plague from one to whom he had trusted his health, even as he himselfe had by Cruelty and treachery circumvented those whom he ought to have protected. Tis fit such Examples as these should be recorded in History and transmitted to posterity, for the Benefit of mankind which is never sufficiently convinced how farre these Cunning practises are different from wisdom and right reason; so that neglecting the Rules of Virtue, Honesty, and Fidelity, they doe for love of false and onely seeming good things by foul and villanous lusts involve themselves in true Evils.

BOOK III.

OW at Rome, part of their forces being kept at home for guard of the City, and for a reserve against the uncertain chances of war, the Armies and Provinces were committed to the charge of the new Consuls. P. Lavinus Latinus was designed against the Tarentines and Pyrrhus, and T. Coruncianus sent to finish the Etrurian War. Lavinus, thinking it would much avail as to his own reputation, so to the Terror of the enemies to provoke them first; and that it was profitable to the Commonwealth to avert the fear and inconveniences of War, as far as might be, from the Roman Territories; leading his Army into Lucania, did there fortifie a Castle in a convenient place, furnishing it with a strong Garrison, both to retard the proceedings of Pyrrhus, and to keep the Lucanians in awe, whose treachery was feared, lest they should dare to revolt to the enemy. Pyrrhus having intelligence of the Roman Consul's approach, though his forces were not yet assembled together, judging it both dishonourable and hurtful now in the beginning of the War to manifest any token of Fear, with what strength he had at present, did forthwith march out to meet him. But that he might find some colourable pretence to draw out the business and gain time, he sent a Messenger with Letters of these Contents: Pyrrhus the King wishes Health to Lavinus, I understand that thou art come forth forth with thine army against the Tarentines, but leaving it for a while, come thou unto me with a small Retinue, and I, taking cognizance of the quarrel, will compel even those who are unwilling, to yield one to the other in what is equal and right. To this Levinus answer'd, We neither accept of thee as an Arbitrator of our Controversies, nor fear thee as an Enemy. But thou seemest to do very absurdly in assuming to thy self the Judgment of other mens Causes, who art thy self guilty of a Crime, and hast not as yet received due punishment for entering Italy without our consent. Know then, that I come no lesse against thee then the Tarentines, to try our Right and Title with a Just army, by the Judgment of Mars the Author and Founder of our Nation. And without delay moving his Ensignes, he sits down between the Cities of Pandofia and Heraclea, in a Champian ground, being divided from the Enemies Camp by the River Sirius.

'Tis reported that Pyrrhus, walking downe to the River side to view the Roman campe, when he had well and diligently consider'd it, said to one of his freinds, Megacles by name, These Barbarians have martiall'd their Army after no barbarous manner, but wee shall soone try what metall they are of. Then having placed strong guards upon the banks, to hinder their Passage through the Fordes, he resolv'd to expect the coming of his Companions; not onely for the Reason of War, hoping the Romans in an enemies Country would quickly be in want of necessary accommodations, but as much regarding the spirit and confidence of Levinus, whose admiration was by a new Testimonie encreas'd with him, in that he had freely without punishment dismissed those spies, which were sent to view his Campe, telling them moreover, That he had another Army bigger then this. In the meane time the Campe being so neer, there were many Pickereings and light skirmishes which tended nothing to the main chance. Almost fifty dayes being now spent in these light skirmishes, the Consul being moved with the same reasons to hasten the fight, as Pyrrhus was to defer it, assembling his Souldiers together, gave them to understand his Intentions, and encourag'd them against the fear of a new enemy, extenuating, as much as might be, the fame of Pyrrhus, and the Terror of the Elephants; at length preparing himself for all assayes, he resolves either to fight the enemy by Consent, or compel him to Battel. Therefore seeing Pyrrhus still continue in his resolution, he sendeth out beforehand all his horse, as if to forrage the Country, himself with his Legions in Battel Array, expecting till the tumult and noise on the other side of the River should give them warning. The horse fetching a compass far from the Camps, cross the River where no Guard was, and immediately advance to the enemies stations on that side the River: The Epirots terrified with their sudden approach, betook themselves to their Camp. Pyrrhus understanding the enemy was so near, marcheth in all hast to the River with his whole body of horse, consisting of threethousand, hoping the Romans in their passage through a blind Ford, striving with the stream and unevenness of the ground and breaking their orders, might there be vanquished. But the Roman horse interposing themselves, Pyrrhus riding at the head of his Troops, conspicuous in his shining armor, of singular strength of Body and Resolution of mind, he managed the fight every way correspondent to his Fame and Reputation. He so exactly order'd the whole Battel with his Counsel and Directions, as if he were free from all other labour; yet, as occasion serv'd, he would charge and fight in person, as if to him belong'd only the Office of a Private Souldier, and that the care of the General issue were another man's business. In the mean time one Leonatus a Macedonian, having observed a certain enemy, who neglecting all others, intended himself only against the King, as he flew up and down the field, directing his horse to whatsoever quarter he spied him in, gave Pyrrhus notice of it, who answer'd, No man can avoid the Fate of Mortals, but neither this Italian, nor any other, shall grapple with me without his reward, and due punishment. He had scarce spoken the words, when Oplacus (so was the man named, a Captain of one of the Frentan Troops) wounded the Kings horse with his Spear, Leonatus likewise wounding his, whereupon the Kings friends round besetting him killed Oplacus, stoutly fighting for himself, and delivered the King. But this accident did much daunt the Kings party, as believing him to be slain: Wherefore to confirm his Souldiers, as likewise to decline dangers intended against him, he changed his Armour and weapons with Megacles, and leaving him in the Fight, went himself to order and lead up the Regiments. The Roman Legions were now come up, and the Battel a long time fiercely continued with so doubtful success, that 'tis reported Fortune seven times changed, sometimes the Romans sometimes the Epirots turning their backs.

But the death of Megacles had like to have reduc'd Pyrrhus his affairs even to a most desperate condition, who being in the Kings armour was assaulted by every valiant Enemy who affected the Glory of slaying the King: And at length an Horseman, Dexter by name, having kill'd him, and taking off his Helmet and Gorget, with loud crys carried them to the Consul, thereby ingenerateing a believe in both the Armies of the Kings Death. Hereupon the Gracians were full of Terrour and Consternation, and no doubt had immediately quitted the Field, but that Pyrrhus as soone as might be, uncovering his head rode up and down, with a loud voyce witnessing, That he was a live, and present amongst them, hereby taking away as much Confidence from the Romans, as feare and Despaire from his owne souldiers. Levinus perceiving the Time come, wherein to trie the utmost Remedie, gaveth the Signe to his Horsemen whom he had placed in Ambush, to fall upon the backe of the enemy. But Pyrrhus against this this Troupe commanded his Elephants to be led, which he had likewise reserved for the last Terror to the enemy. This one Contrivance dash't all the Romans hopes, and gave the Issue of the Battaille cleerly on Pyrrhus his side. For the men themselves being astonish'd at the vast bulk of their bodies, and the terrible shew of armed Warriors on their backs thought they had rather seen some strange and formidable Monster, then the shape of any Creature by Nature produced; and as for the horse, they being frightned with the sight, smell and noise of beasts they had never before seen, did forthwith, confounding their ranks, flee every one what way was most open; and either shaking off their riders, or against their wills forcing them to flight, they ran upon their own battel, and filled all things with fear and tumult. The Rectors of the Elephants following the pursuit, many of those that fled were wounded from those who stood in the Towers upon the Elephants, and more were kill'd and trodden under foot by the beasts themselves. The Consul making use of his best skill, did as yet keep his main battel together, till, by the command of Pyrrhus, the Thessalian wing being sent amongst them, did rout and scatter them, not being able to resist. And no question but in the place they were hemm'd in; they had every man been slain or taken prisoners, but that, besides the Custom of Pyrrhus, who thought it not General like too severely to press upon those who fled, left by despair of safety they should be provoked to make more sharp resistance, the evening likewise being far spent compelled them to relinquish the pursuit. Fortune likewise favour'd the remnant of the unfortunate Army, in that an Elephant being wounded turned back and with its braying confounded the rest. This putting a Remora to the enemy, gave liberty to those that fled to cross the River into Apulia, where they sheltered the mselves in a fenced City against the present danger. I find that in this fight there were fourteen thousand eight hundred and seventy foot of the Romans and their friends slain, with two hundred and fourcore horsemen; there were taken in all eighteen hundred and twelve, in which number were eight hundred and two horsemen; there was lost likewise two and twenty Colours. Whereby I wonder the more why some Authors, who undertake exactly to relate this encounter, deny that any notice was taken how many were wanting on the Kings side; whereas Dionysius writeth, that Levinus lost little lesse then fifteen thousand, and that on the Victor's side thirteen thousand fell. But Hieronimus Cardianus, an impartial writer of those times, affirms, That of the Roman army there fell but seven thousand, and of the Kings army under four thousand. But this is by all agreed on, That the Victory cost Pyrrhus the very Flower both of his Captains and Souldiers, and that he was heard to say, He was no less Conquer'd then Conqueror in that Battel. And when he offer'd the spoiles and gifts to Junius Bruttus, he confessed as much, inscribing that sentence in the Title, and when his friend complain'd, he repli'd, Of a truth, if I obtain such another Victory, I shall return into Epirus without e're a Souldier. I have likewise an Author that the King himself received a grievous wound in this fight, but because others report no such thing, and that I often see the circumstances of several battels confounded, I dare not in the general silence of so many and those more accurate Authors, give credit to one single one.

That it was fought with great animosity and valour, this one argument is sufficient, That when Pyrrhus next day view'd the slain corps (which for the reputation of his Humanity and Clemency he caused to be buried) he finding that all the Romans died with honourable wounds having their faces turn'd to the enemy, he cry'd out, How easie were it for me to gain the Empire of the whole world, if I had but Roman souldiers! Neither did he defer with any complement and large promises to court those who were in his power, to receive pay under him, and not being able to perswade them, he did, nevertheless treat them with great humanity and clemency, freeing them from chains and whatever other reproach usually attends the fortune of prisoners. But the Romans thus batter'd by the late fight were terrified with another misfortune, though not of so great loss, yet which caused more fear and Religious horror. For it was imputed to the manifest anger of the gods, that their men who were sent forth for forrage and relief, were overtaken by a sudden and most violent Tempest; wherein four and thirty were amidst the stupendious noise of the Heavens, struck dead by Thunderbolts, and two and twenty smitten and left half dead, their Cattel also by the same storm were most of them slain or made of no use.

Pyrrhus in the mean time having taken the empty and forsaken Camp of the Romans, made quick use of his victory, waisting all the Neighbour Countries, and turning many people from the Roman friendship. The Lucanians and Samnites then come in to him, whom lightly chiding, That they had not assisted him in the battel, he nevertheless gave them part of the spoils; therein much rejoicing and exulting, That by his own strength, with no other aid but that of the Tarentines, he had slain so many of the Romans. Pyrrhus being thus intent in reaping the fruit of his Victory, Levinus on the other side curing his wounded, and recollecting his disperfed men, had gathered together a force no way contemptible, and the Senate (though many imputed the losse only to the Consul's default, and Fabrizius said, It seem'd to him, that the Romans were not beaten by the Epirots, but Levinus by Pyrrhus) decreed a recruit and supply to be sent him. When the Cryer proclaimed, That they who would serve their Country in the place of them who were slain, should give in their names, they list'd themselves so fast, that presently they compleated the number of two Legions.

The Consul recruited with these forces, follow'd the steps of Pyrrhus, vexing his Army with what inconveniencies he could. And understanding the Kings Resolution to seize upon Capua, leading his Army thither in haste, he prevented him, and preparing all things for Defence, he deterr'd him from assaulting the City. Pyrrhus turning his Course to Naples, and there likewise being frustrated of his Expectation, forthwith by long journeys marcheth toward Rome in the Latine high way, and now having passed through Anagnia, and the Hernician Territories, taking in Fregella by the way, he was come to Præneste within Twenty miles of the City. But the Magistrates there, as soon as they understood of the Overthrow, had by Order of the Senate armed their choice young men: and the Fortune of the Roman People had in this the time of their Necessity, provided them another very strong help and succour; For the other Consul Tib. Coruncianus encountering the Etrurians with better success, had tied the whole Nation to new Covenants, and being called back by the Senate to the Defence of his Countrey, having no other Enemy to distract him, came home with his Victorious Army. Pyrrhus having in vain attempted to draw the Etrurians again into Armes, and considering that, besides a City secure with its own guards, he had two Consuls with their Armies, one on the Front, the other on his Reare, returned back into Campania; where meeting Lavinus with greater forces then before his Overthrow, he said, He had to deal with a Lernæan Hydra, whose heads being lately struck off, spring up again in a greater Number; yet confiding in his former Victory, he drew out his Army and marshall'd it as resolving to fight, and that he might discover the Cheerfulness of his souldiers, and likewise terrifie the Enemy; he caus'd his men to shout and the Elephants to be provoked to bray. But the Romans returned a farre greater and more terrible shout, whereby conjecturing the Spirits of each, he judg'd it fit to abstain from fight at the Present, and complaining of ill omen in the Entrailes of sacrifices, he drew back his Army first into his Camp, and afterward with much plunder and a great Troop of Captives, to Tarentum.

The Romans (who in their hardest times had remitted nothing of their Constancy, but as to the main Issue of the warre alwayes spake high, as conceiving ample hopes) thinking this a most fit time to give rewards and Encouragement to Virtue, decreed a Triumph to L. Emilius Barbula for those exploits performed in his Consulship. He triumphed A. D. the fourth of the Ides of July, over the Tarentines, Samnites, and Salentines who were Auxiliaries of the Tarentines. But P. Valerius was order'd to draw the Remnant of his Conquer'd Army into the Sotino fields, there to fortifie his Camp, and cause them to winter in their huts. About the same time the Senate disputing whether it were fit to redeem the Captives, resolv'd affirmatively; that which chiefly perswaded them, was I believe the Horsemen's Case, for they had stoutly maintained the fight during the absence of the Elephants, at whose approach the horse without any fault of the Riders, yielded them up to Death; and to Bonds; upon this Errand were sent Embassadours of Principall Dignity, P. Cornelius Dolabella famous for his Desolation of Sena in Gallia, C. Fabricius Luncianus, and Q. Emilius Papus, who two yeares since were Collegues in the Consulship: Pyrrhus by Nature was Endow'd with humanity, the inseparable Companion of great Spirits, and that he did encrease by his Ambition, according to the Vulgar Errour, esteeming all Virtues the servants to Domination, to which onely being intemperately given, he did direct all his Counsells for the attaining it; And though he were not inferiour to any Commander of that Age in Boldness of mind and the Arts of Warre, yet was he wont to try all meanes before he came to Blows; he would sollicite the mind of his Enemy as he saw most opportune with Feare, or Desire, or Pleasure, or Mercy, or with equality and benefit of Conditions. Therefore understanding Embassadours were coming from Rome, and judging so many Consular men were not sent but upon some Grand Affaires, he was in good hopes they would treat of Compounding a Peace. Therefore that their access might be the safer and the more honourable, he sent Lycus (by nation a Molossian) even to the borders of the Tarentine Territories, to meet them with a Guard. Himselfe on Horseback with rich Caparisons met them without the Gates, and having magnificently brought them in, he entertain'd them with all Respect, liberality and plenty that might be.

They premising somewhat tending to Moderation of the mind, as how great the Inconstancy of Fortune is, how sudden the Changes of Warre, and that future Contingents cannot be foreseen, deliver their Message, That they came to receive their Captives, whether he would suffer them at a Certain price to be redem'd, or to be exchanged for Tarentines and others. Pyrrhus whose Custom it was, not to transact any thing of moment without advice of his friends, convened them now together, and Milo's Opinion was, That he should detain the Captives, make use of his fortune, and not cease the Warre till he had thoroughly subdued the Romans; Cineas his Counsell was very different, for, speaking first of the Constancy of the Senate and People of Rome, which they had often shewn even in the hardest times to be invincible; he added moreover, As for other Enemies 'tis likely we may hate their manners or contemnt their Armes, but with this Nation, O King, 'tis better making Friendship then Warre, and 'tis convenient not only to return the Captives, but freely to dismiss them without Ransome; Neither is any delay to be made, but that you send back the Embassadours with Presents, to conclude Peace upon equall Terms: For this I take to be the time, wherein with honour and Credit you may accomplish a Business (in my judgement) very necessary. For now your affaires having succeeded prosperously, you shall both more easily by Treaty obtain what you desire, and likewise seem for no other Cause but the innate Greatness and Goodness of your mind, to offer Peace unto those whom you might by force have reduced into slavery. And farre be it from Thee, but that Thy Designs should prosper as they have begun; Yet We are but Men, and if Fortune change her side, neither will it be so easie a matter to Obtaine Peace, neither can it with so much honour be treated on. When the rest agreed in the same Opinion, the King himselfe likewise assenting, commanded the Roman Embassadors to be called, to whom he spake in this Manner; Your Errand, Romans, seemeth to me very unworthy, for having no Consideration of entering into Friendship with me, you require back the Prisoners of Warre, whom being restor'd, you are ready presently to make use of against me. If therefore you will intend your Minds on better Counsell, beneficiall to both Parties, and make a League and Society with me, I will restore all your Citizens and Companions in Armes without price or Ransom; otherwise if you continue hostility, I shall think it no wise part, to strengthen your Hatred against me with the hands of so many Valiant men. Neither is Money so scarce with me as to need any from the Romans whom it would better become, if we were Friends, to be enriched by my bounty; Withall he commanded gifts of good value to be given the Embassadors, with promise he would bestow more and of greater Price. These things were spoken and acted openly in the Presence of all the Embassadors. But with C. Fabricius he had afterward a longer and more serious discourse. Neither shall I think it unfit to relate what I find in good Authors; When therefore they had speech together in secret without witness, among other things 'tis reported the King said thus: My desire is to have all the Romans my Friends, but especially your selfe, whom I esteeme above all others, as most eminent in Civill and Military virtues, onely one Thing I am troubled to find wanting in you, that having but slender substance you are not able to maintaine that Port and Splendour which justly attends Great men, as their Due; But I will not suffer you any longer to be sensible of this Injury, and despite of Fortune, I will freely bestow so large a summe of Gold and Silver, as you shall easily exceed the Revenues of the Richest. For I am perswaded it belongs to my Place and Fortune, to relieve the hard Wants of Worthy men, who have endeavour'd more to obtaine Glory then Wealth: Truly I think it to be a faire and honourable Work, and that there cannot be, either a more illustrious monument of Kingly Magnificence, or a more precious and Acceptable Offering unto the Gods: so that I shall rather think you do me a Courtesie, then receive one at my hands, if you will suffer your selfe to be relieved by my Plenty. Neither truly would I urge this to you if on my side onely the Bounty should seem Glorious, on your side the Acceptance dishonourable. But now seeing I tempt you not to Treason or the commission of any Fact misbecoming your Grave Manners; what Reason is there why you should with a resolute and obstinate mind refuse a small Gift, with a free and Friendly intent offered? For I desire nothing of you, but what may, may of duty ought to be done by the best of Men, and most tender of their Countreys Good, that you would perswade the Senate to forsake their wilful stubbornness, and recall their mindes to Equity and milder Counsells, giving them to understand the Truth, that neither can the Warre be continued without your great Loss and Danger, neither can I (having promised help to the Tarentines, and proved Victor in the first Battell) without manifest breach of faith, and diminution of mine Honour relinquish it; Neither indeed do I delight in fighting with you whom I judge farre more worthy my Friendship then my Hatred, and had much rather return home into mine own Kingdom, where many businesses in the interim arise, which require my presence. And for this I will give you what assurance you shall desire, whereby you may be satisfied concerning my Intentions, and resolve the Doubts of others; if any shall think it not safe to trust to Kings, by reason of the fault of some, who, standing to their Agreements and Covenants so long onely as it seemeth for their Profit, when they perceive any benefit to be gain'd by Change, have chosen rather to break their Faith then lose an Advantage. And when the Peace shall be concluded, there is nothing will please me better, or be more commodious to us Both, then that you would bear me company into Epirus, where you shall have the Principal place among my Subjects, be my Lieutenant in Warre, and Partner of all my Fortunes. For I esteeme no Possession more precious then that of a Valiant and Faithfull Friend, and certainly the splendour of a Kingly Fortune, and the Majesty of Royall affaires will well become your great Mind. These things if we shall in Common conferre; mutually helping one the other, we shall without any difficulty attain to the greatest Happiness that man is capable of or can imagine.

When the King had thus made an end of speaking, after a little distance Fabricius answer'd, Concerning my Vertue, if any could be observ'd either in my military or Civill employments, it is needlesse for me to discourse seeing you have already trusted the Relation of others concerning it. Neither is it necessary to declare my poverty, that, being the master of a little ground and a small Cottage, I maintaine my self neither by usury nor the sweat of servantes, but by the labour and exercise of my owne Body, seeing this also you have truly learn'd by the discourse of others. But if, either on your owne accord, or following the Opinion of others, you judge me, by reason of my poverty, to be in worse condition then any other Roman, you are wonderfully deceived. For despising Riches, embracing Vertue, and doing my duty, I was never sensible of any misery; neither in private or publick business did I ever repine at my Fortune. For what Reason have I to speake ill of fortune, unlesse I should impute it as a crime crime to her, that I enjoy all those things which to great and high spirits are most desirable, not only with the Rich, but many times before them? I am dignified with the greatest honours our country affordeth. The heaviest wars are committed to my Charge, I am entrusted with the care of our most holy Devotions, I am call'd into the Senate, my opinion is asked concerning the most weighty affairs, I am commended and cheerfully imitated by many; neither am I of less esteem then the most potent man in the City; I seem unto others an example and pattern of attaining Virtue and Glory; to all this bestowing no cost either of mine own or others. For in other places, where particular mens wealth is great, and the publick stock but small, the Magistrates sustain the dignity and splendor of their office by their own expence: In our City the custome is much different, no private mans fortune being on any side burthened. All this great and glorious pomp, wherewith our Citizens, who are chosen to the administration of grand affairs, are so magnificently set forth, is of publick allowance; which order maketh all men equal, so that the poorest man shall want nothing for the maintaining either the publick or his own grace, neither shall the richest in any thing abound. Wherefore seeing, though I am the poorest of all, yet I do in no good thing yield to the richest of all; why should I complain of Fortune? should I desire to be equal with Kings, who may board up vast sums and heaps of gold? But hitherto I have spoken in reference to my life in Publick, even in private also my indigence is so far from being a burden or inconvenience to me, that contrariwise, as often as I compare my self with the rich ones, my condition seemeth incomparably more happy, and I reckon my self among those few who have attained to as much Felicity as this life admits of, in which regard I mightily rejoyce and give thanks to my Poverty. For it seeming to me idle and foolish to pursue after things superfluous, and that my little ground being rightly till'd and manured yieldeth all necessities; I know not to what end I should be solicitous of greater Riches. My Meat hunger makes sweet to me, and thirst my Drink; after labour my sleep is easie and quiet; my garments, if they defend me from cold, are of proof sufficient; and my household stuff, according as it is apt and fit for those uses it was ordained to, so it very well pleaseth me. So that herein also I should be injurious to accursed Fortune, that it hath not allowed me larger substance then nature desires, which hath neither ingenerated in me a covetousness of what is too much, nor a dexterity of scraping it together. Wherefore with this my poverty I judge my self more wealthy then the richest men, yea then thy self also, for I have so much that I desire no more, whereas unless you thought your self poor notwithstanding your possession of Epirus, and all other your Territories, why came you over into Italy? But Riches you may object, gives one a fair opportunity of doing good to mankind, and that I in my poverty can be bountiful to no body. Truly this troubleth me no more then that in other things also I do not abound: That the gods have not endowed me with knowledge superexcellent, and the Art of Prophecying and many other the like things, whereby I might benefit those who in these kinds want help. But if I freely communicate to my friends and fellow-Citizens those things which are in my power, and suffer every one in common to participate of what may any way pleasure them, I shall think my self free from that crime of being useless or unprofitable to mankind. Neither would I have you esteem those things small and contemptible, because others seem greater in your eyes, and therefore you are ready to buy men with large bribes. But, if for supplying the necessities of the poor, Riches were altogether to be desired, and that in this respect the possession of moneys were to be reckon'd as a part of Felicity, as you Kings seem to be persuaded, which think you, were the better way of purchasing wealth, that I should now with disgrace receive it at your hands, or that I should, when it was in my power, have long ago gather'd it upon most honest accounts? For my prosperous management of Publick affairs, hath given me fair opportunities of growing Rich, as often at other times, so especially when four years since, being Consul, and sent with an army against the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians I overcame those large and fertile Territories wasting and spoiling, when being conqueror in many Battles, I took by force and demolish'd wealthy Cities, whereupon the Souldiers being largely rewarded and all debts paid which the Commonwealth had contracted with private men for carrying on the War, there was yet so much remaining that I carried into the Publick Treasury four hundred Talents. Now after I have scorn'd to acquire just and honest Riches by those spoils which were in my hands, and by the example of Valerius Publicola (and others who have advanced the Roman State) have preferred Glory before money, shall I receive gifts of thee, and embrace a shameful and dangerous opportunity of growing Rich, having neglected a fair and honourable means? And truly, that wealth I could freely, with pleasure, and good conscience have expended in just and honest uses, which what I receive of you I cannot do: For that money is, rather to be accounted lent then bestow'd which proceeds from another's bounty, and however it be given and received under the specious pretence of hospitality, friendship or good will, is burthenome to an Ingenuous and high Spirit till it be restored. And what do you think will be the issue of this business when it is known (as conceal'd it cannot be) if the Censour, who with ample authority exercise the superinspection of Manners amongst us, shall (according to that power wherewith they are invested to enquire into the Lives of the Citizens, and punish those who deviate from the Institutions of our Fathers) publicly summon me to give an account of the reasons, why I received any Gifts from thee?

Many

Many report that Pyrhus, resolving at any rate to winne a man of such Excellent vertue, did yet more earnestly tempt his Constancy, and after other magnificent promises, making a proffer of half his Kingdom could not therewith move him, but that still he persisted to deny the Accomplishment of the Kings desires, For, saies he, if I am an euill man, why doe you court me? If good, why would you corrupt me? adding moreover, That this businesse would proue neither pleasing nor profitable to Pyrhus if it should succeed, for if he should make use of his liberty, 'twould be hateful both for the King and his Friends, as for his Justice and Abstinence, if the Epirots once had experience of them, they would forsake the King and apply themselves wholly to him. These things, and what hereafter I shall add, being by various Authors related, I thought neither inconvenient nor unprofitable to collect and declare, that the mind and sense of those men may be known, who supported the Roman State in most difficult times, and improv'd it to that incomparable height of Glory and Empire it attain'd to: and that by a clear example it may be apprehended, what Virtues and Manners ought to be practis'd by those men, who would become objects of Admiration, and transmit to their posterity a more flourishing Commonwealth then they received from their Ancestours. These things being spoken and heard on both sides, the King at present contented himself, but on the morrow, causing Fabricius to be sent for, he prepared an Elephant before hand to frighten him, who standing at their backs behind the hangings, as they were discouraging, the hangings being on a sudden withdrawn, at the Masters command laid his snout on Fabricius his head, making a most horrid noise; but he, being a man of a settled spirit, gravely turning himself about, smiled, saying, Neither yesterday did your gold entice me, nor to day your beast terrifie me. Afterwards being set at supper, when he heard Cineas discoursing of the Grecian Philosophers of the Sect of Epicurus, that they esteemed Pleasure the greatest good, and the cares of the Commonwealth the chiefest hinderance of Felicity: That the gods in their opinion took such a life as was free from the care of humane affairs, free from all affections either of anger against the wicked, or favour to the good, giving themselves over wholly to idleness and pleasure: Fabricius thereupon is said to cry out, The gods grant that Pyrhus and the Samnites would practise this wisdom while they wage War with the people of Rome. These were the manners of those times, this was the Emulation of great men, to excel not in wealth or Luxury, but in Virtue, in Counsel, in Patience, in the Love of their Country. Neither were these sudden Motions and fits, or speeches premeditated out of hypocrisie for the present occasion, but they did confirm the faith of their words by the constant Tenour of their Lives, whereby they are rather to be admired then imitated by our Age. The same Fabricius when all his silver plate consisted of one Salt-celler and a little dish, which yet was sustained by an horning foot, the Samnite Embassadors presenting him with a gift of money and very rich household stuff, let his hands to his ears, thence to his eyes, nose, mouth, throat, and at length to his belly, saying, As long as Fabius commands these, nothing shall be wanting to me, carry ye back your money to those who stand in need of it.

After the same manner he spent his whole life, in so much as in all his Patrimony there was not sufficient whereby to raise Portions for his Daughters: (an Honourable poverty!) so that the Senate caused money for that purpose to be disbursed out of the Publick Treasury, being ashamed to let those Virgins passe without Dowry, whose Father was not ashamed to leave so. The same vertue and continence was found in other Princes of the Senate; among the rest Q. Fabius who had so often been in Chief command, and having once borne the Censourship denied to be made Censour againe, saying, It was not for the good of the Commonwealth, that the same men should often be chosen Censour; he died with the same Testimony both of his poverty, and the peoples Love; for after his Death they bestow'd so much money that his son Q. Gurgus did bestow a dole of flesh upon the people, & likewise made a publick Feast. Curtius out of the same gallantry of mind refus'd the gifts of the Sabines as Fabricius did the Samnites: Emilius Papas, who was in most offices Colleague with Fabricius, also Tib. Coruncianus, and many other men of great note, by reason of their likeness in manners, lived together in great love and friendship: So that the Poet seems to me to have conceived in his mind the Idea of those times, when he said, The Roman State was upheld by men and manners of the old Fashion. Pyrhus seriously considering and pondering these things, was inflamed with a great desire of composing all differences with this Nation, and immediately restored two hundred of the Captives without Ransome, and gave leave likewise to all the rest to go to Rome and visit their friends at the Feast of Saturn now approaching, relying only on the word of Fabricius, who promised, That when the Holy dayes were past they should return, unlesse peace were in the mean time concluded.

And such was the Gravity of the Senate, and the fidelity of every single Person, that at a Day by the Fathers appointed, they every man redelivered themselves up to Pyrhus, having in vain urged their Country mens obstinate minds to Articles of Peace. For the Crafty King, thinking this to be a nick of time for his purpose, while the Romans being mollified with the sight of their dearest friends, and desirous of retaining them, might happily be the more ready to lay down all thoughts of hatred and hostility, resolved now to send an Ambassage to Rome to Treat of Peace on those Conditions he had propounded to Fabricius in Person. He desired, That the Tarentines might be comprehended in the League, That the other Grecians inhabiting Italy might continue free, living according to their own Lawes: That whatsoever the

Romans

- Romans had taken away from the Samnites, Apulians, Lucanians and Brutians might be restored; and in Lieu, the Romans should receive their Captives without Ransom. Cineas of whom mention hath formerly been made, was at that time with Pyrrhus, a man as of great knowledge in Civil affairs, so of very honest principles, and who had by exercise improved his natural wit to a marvellous eloquence: For these his qualities he was very dear to the King, who often acknowledged, He had won more Cities by the Eloquence of Cineas, then by his own Armes. This man being sent Embassador to Rome, with much cunning delay'd making his addresse to the Senate, till he had in Pyrrhus his name distributed many gifts in the houses of the principal men. Being then brought into the Court, when he had in many words, Extolled the virtue of Pyrrhus, and his inclination towards the Romans, he discoursed of the Equity of the conditions he brought, insomuch that great part of the Senate were moved to accept them: because besides other conveniencies, he promised, If they would desist molesting his friends, he would furnish them with aid sufficient for the Conquest of all the rest of Italy. But, because the Consultation lasted many dayes (the Fathers being very solicitous in a business of so great consequence) and thereby a suspicion and rumor was spread, that peace would be concluded, Appius Claudius, who by reason of his Age and blindness, had of a long time been absent from the Senate, caused himself now to be carried thither in his Litter, where he no sooner appeared, but his sons and sons in law with all Reverence and Duty receiving him, conducted him to a place becoming his Dignity. Every one being silent both at the novelty of the thing, and with the respect they bore his person, and expecting for what cause, after so long absence and retirement, he should now come into the Senate: he beginning his discourse with the affliction of his sickness, said, His Blindness had indeed hitherto been very grievous to him, but now he was not only delighted in it, lest he should behold those things which were doing, but was sorry that his eares also were not deaf, that he might not hear things so sordid and unworthy the name of the Romans. For what is become of your noble minds? whither are your spirits fallen? Ye were wont to be of opinion, when ye heard the Fame of Alexander the Macedonian renowned as of an invincible King, that his glory was more to be imputed to his Fortune then his Virtue; that if the Fates had allotted him a Roman War, both the event, and likewise his esteem amongst men, would have proved far different. But now, behold how ye are degenerated from that your Magnanimity; ye once thought ye were able to conquer the Macedonians, and now ye stand in fear of Molossians and Chaonians, the perpetual prey of the Macedonians. Ye once contemned Alexander, and now are frightened by Pyrrhus, not the servant of Alexander, but his servants servant, who flying from his old enemies rather then seeking new, is come over into Italy with a resolution, should it please the gods, to obtain the Empire of Rome, with those forces wherewith he was not able to keep and defend his little share of Macedonia. Unless therefore we send him back well beaten, laden with great misfortune, assure your selves, any other Party, deservedly slighting and scorning our Power, will greedily venture into Italy, as to a prey ready prepared to their hands. For what can be thought of us, but that we are a cowardly slothful people, if Pyrrhus, being received into friendship, shall carry back a Reward for that Disgrace he hath done us, in as much as by his means it is come to pass that the Romans are become a Laughing-stock to the Tarentines and Samnites?
- This was the main scope of Appius his Oration, which did so inflame the minds of all the Senators, that, following him the Author of a severe Sentence, they with one consent decreed, That the War should be prosecuted, that Cineas should the same day depart the City, that Pyrrhus should be given to understand, That neither he should be admitted into the City, (for that also was desired) neither would they so much as treat of friendship and society, till he had quitted Italy. A like sad decree by Appius his motion was made concerning the Captives, That they should not be led in War against Pyrrhus, neither should they any where be joyned in the same company, but that being sent to several Garrisons, they should, as a note of infamy, change their manner of fighting, that they who before served on horse-back, should now be lifted among the foot, and they who were of the Legions, should now serve in light armature; That no man should recover his former order, till he had brought in the Spoil of two enemies. 'Tis reported, when the Embassadors returned with this sharp answer, the King astonish'd at the wonderful constancy of the Romans, asked, What they thought of the City and of the Senate? and that Cineas answer'd, The City seemed to be a Temple of the gods, and the Senate an Assembly of Kings.
- After these Transactions, some think, Fabricius was sent an Embassador to the King: but they are easily convinc'd of Errour as by the Testimony of other Authours, so by a right Consideration of the Series of Affaires. There being now no hopes of peace, they converted all their thoughts to War, and busied themselves on both sides all winter in making diligent preparations. These I take to be the Times wherein Pyrrhus is reported, (for the avoiding the Dangers of shipwrack, and a more convenient passage of the Italian and Epirot Succours one to the other) to have had thoughts of making Bridges between Hydrunt, where Italy gets farthest into the sea, and Apollonia, a Town situate on the adverse shore, some fifty miles distant: For that is the Breadth of the Sea in those places between the Grecian and Italian shoares. M. Terentius Varro is said afterward to have made the like Attempt, when, being Cn. Magnus his Lieutenant tenant in the warre against the Pirates, he guarded the Sicilian and Ionian seas with his Navy. In the midst of these doings Tib. Coruncianus the Consul Triumphed A.D. of the Calends of February. This year was a remarkable Cenfourship in that a Lustration of the army was then first made by one of a Plebeian stock. There were celled two hundred seventy eight thousand, two hundred twenty two Citizens. About these times it was that Q. Fabius Maximus was wont to be chosen Prince of the Senatè; and by conjecture we gather, his son Q. Gargus was Cenfour at that Time. Cn. Domitius certainly was, for he lustrated the Army, and his name is famous for enlarging the Priviledges of the People. Pyrhus in the beginning of the spring, calling together the Forces of his Confederates, marched into Apulia, where he took many Towns, some by Force, some by Composition. Against whom the two new Consuls P. Sulpicius Saverrio, and P. Decius Mus went forth with two Armies pitching Camp against Camp, neer Asculum a City of Apulia, of the same name with that City of the Picentes. No doubt was made of Fighting, but they were many dayes hindered as by a deep Torrent running between them, so by mutuall fear on each side. The Romans were troubled with remembrance of the former Battell wherein Pyrhus was victorious: The Epirots were daunted at the Roman obstinacy, but chiefly at the name of the other Consul, so fatal to the Enemies Legions: For it was given out that P. Decius after the Example of his Father and Grandfather would purchase the Victory with his Death; and the issue of those Battells wherein they died, did make the expectation of the Decian Devotion to be terrible to all men.

Pyrhus thinking it a matter not to be neglected, assembling his soldiers together, Thus instructed them. That the Event of Battels was not in the Power either of the Goddesses Earth, or the Infernal Deities, who were invoked by that Charme, that they ought not to believe the Gods to be so unjust as to alter the fates of Armies, and bestow conquests for one mad-man's sake; that victories are not obtained by juggling tricks, and superstition, but by fighting onely; as appears by the Testimony of the Romans themselves, who come not into the field with troopes of Priests and Prophets, but with Legions of armed soldiers to oppose the Enemy: But because the ignorant are commonly more terrified with these superstitious delusions, then with true causes of feare, he shewed that this feare might be prevented, by shewing the Habit wherein the former Decius had Devoted themselves, and warning the soldiers if they met any Man in the like accoutrement not to assault him with any weapon, but to take him alive. He caused likewise a Message to be sent to Decius, That he should forbear playing the fools amongst armed men, neither should his Plot take Effect, that if he came alive into his hands he should perhaps endure more torments then he was willing. 'Twas answer'd by the Consuls, They had Confidence enough in their Armes, neither had any need of so desperate a Design, which that he might be assured of, they gave him his Choice, whether he would come over the River interjacent, or Expect the Romans on his side the water; that they would willingly withdraw their forces to give him a safe passage over, or, if he would retire, they would bring over their men, that on each side encountering with their strength entire, demonstration might be made, that they repesed all their hopes of Victory in their men, and their Courage, and in no other thing: Pyrhus was ashamed of betraying any kind of fear or Doubt; he accepted therefore of the latter Condition and gave the Enemy Liberty of fording the River. The Terrour of the Elephants was not now so great to the Romans, as being accustomed to see them, so having had Experience that their snouts might easily be cut off, as one was in the last fight at one blow by C. Minucius the foremost Pikeman of the Fourth Legion. But now they bethought themselves of safer guards and Defences; They caused horses cloathed with Iron plates to draw Chariots, which were likewise full stuck with spears fastned in Iron sockets, in the Chariots were placed soldiers who with darts or fire should avert the fury of the Elephants. The Legions with this furniture having passed the River, Pyrhus in a singular and Excellent manner martial'd his Army, according to his Custom wherein he was thought to exceed all Commanders of his Time. Observing therefore the Nature of the place, which by reason of the Ruggedness of the Ground, and the multitude of Officers thereabouts growing, would well admit of a foot Army onely; he placed his horse and Elephants in the Reserve. The Right wing he strengthned with his own soldiers and the Samnite Auxiliaries. The Brutians Lucanians and Sallentines he placed in the midst, the Tarentines whose virtue he least confided in, he order'd in the midst. The Consul's main body consisted of their Legions, some of the light Armature being conveniently intermixt; and with the like Discretion they distinguished the Orders of their Reserves. The horse were distributed into the Wings, being no hindrance to the Foot fight, and yet upon occasion offer'd, ready for Action. The Armys being equal, not only in Courage but in number (for they were forty thousand strong on both sides) disputed the business with as much heat and animosity as could be expected, and the Victory inclining to neither side, the night broke off the Fight. The next Morning Pyrhus when he had guarded the most difficult places, forced the Romans to descend into a more even and open ground; there he had some use of his Elephants, which being suddenly brought in to that part of the Battell where the Chariots were prepared against them, they frighted the horse (even as it hapned in the last fight) and caused them to fly; but to the Foot they did little harme. The Report of this Fight is much different from that of the former, for some Authors affirm, The Romans had the upper hand, their Victory being occasion'd by an accident, for the Apulians (who were by the Kings Order sent against those who came to surprize the carriages) by their departure seeming to fly, by a near error and false fear caus'd all the Kings forces to quit the field and fly indeed. The number of the slain is likewise expressed, That on Pyrrhus his side twenty thousand, on the Romans side five thousand were wanting, that the King with a dart shot through his arm was grievously wounded, and that in vain endeavouring to stay the flight of his men, was by his Life-guard brought out of the field one of the last; that on his side three and fifty Colonns were lost, on the Romans eleven, and that Fabricius the other Consuls Lieutenant was likewise wounded. But contrariwise, others say, This Battel had the like event with the former, though the Romans by reason of the vicinity of their Camps sustained not so much loss; but that they did confessedly fly, and lost six thousand men; that Pyrrhus lost three thousand five hundred and five, as is in the Kings Chronicles registered by the Testimony of Hieronimus.

And not only variety but Repugnancy of Authors moves me rather to incline to those who report the event of this Battel to have been doubtfull: for 'tis ordinary after an equall encounter for each part to attribute the victory to themselves, which by the negligence or impudence of others is committed to writing, doing very ill to deliver to Posterity for true and undoubted, those things which are grounded on Idle report only, or for affection are partially related. Wherefore their history seemes more probable who affirmes, That there was but one Fight neere Asculum; and that, after an hot dispute and much blood-shed, the Sun being now set, the Kings wound and the losse of the Baggage did with much adoe breake off the fight: That then both Armies sounded a Retreat, when on both sides there were slaine about fifteen thousand; and that this was the time when Pyrrhus answer'd one who congratulated his victory, If the Romans are thus to be Vanquished we are undone our selves. And indeed the sequel confirms this Opinion, for Pyrrhus retired to Tarentus, and the Consuls, making no pursuite after the enemy, distributed their forces into winter quarters in Apulia, whereas the time of yeare gave them leave, and Reasons of War might well have perswaded them, to have prosecuted so glorious a victory. Moreover I find not that these Consuls made any Triumph, and many think that P. Decimus in this Battel devoted himselfe, who dying as did his Father and Grandfather, yielded himself the Third sacrifice, without intermission out of the same family, for the good of the Commonwealth: Which as I had no thoughts to gain-say, So should I not have related in the general silence of all Historys, but that a grave Author M. Tullius Cicero in his bookes of Phylosophy more then once maketh mention of it. The fight at Asculum thus ended, the rest of the yeare was quiet and free from all warlike Expeditions, only the whole time spent in Consultation and preparations. Pyrrhus, having lost most of his old forces, friends, and Commanders, sent into Epirus with order for a supply of Men and money for next spring. But before that Navy could be set forth, new hopes arising alter'd the Kings Counsels. Pyrrhus had sometime the possession of Macedonia, wresting it out of the hands of Demetrius, and again lost it by the Power of Lysimachus; Now while Pyrrhus waged war in Italy, Ptolomaeus Ceraunus being slaine by the Gaules, there seem'd a new way open into Macedonia, being destitute of a Prince and the state of affaires in Confusion. This Reason perswaded him not to leave Epirus naked of souldiers, lest it should be obnoxious to the injurys of the Gaules who now oppressed the Neighbour nation Macedonia. But Pyrrhus did not as then steere his Course homeward, being upon other Occasions (as shall be related) call'd into Sicily. The winter being past over in these Cares the New Consuls came to the Army C. Fabricius Luscinus, and Q. Aemilius Papus (who before had born a Consulship together) which Pyrrhus understanding drew forth his forces, intending to observe the Marches and Counsels of his enemy. Their Camps being not far distant, there happed an Accident very remarkable, and by most men related much after the same manner; One Timochares an Ambracian, who held a good honourable place in the Kings favour, secretly came to Fabricius, and promised him, if he would give him an answerable reward, to Poyson the King; which he thought was easie for him to accomplish by his sons, who were Cup-bearers to the King. Fabricius, no way delighted with the Treason, informed the Senate of it, the Senate, not discovering the Treason of Timochares, who had (by what means soever) intended the Roman profit, sent Embassadors to Pyrrhus, who should only in general warn him, That he should look well about him, and take heed of what mens service he made use of, and enquire into their faithfulness and honesty. Thus Valerius Antius relates the business. But Claudius Quadrigarius in stead of Timochares make Niceas the undertaker of this Poysoning, and that notice was given not by the Senate but by the Consuls, reciting also the Letter of the Consuls, wherein they discover Niceas his design, That they are unwilling to fight by craft, or with money, and wish the King safe from Treason, hoping he will become an Illustrious Ornament to their Victory and Triumph.

Some Report it was the Kings Physician who treated with Fabricius either in person or by Letter, and that upon his discovery, he was hang'd. As there may be doubt in these Circumstances, so no question they are deceived who say that Curius sent back the Physician to the King. 'Tis said that Pyrrhus at this time wondring at the Experience of so great Vertue in Enemies, cry'd out, This is that Fabricius, who can with no lesse difficulty swerve from the Rules of Justice and Honesty, then the Sun be turned out of his Course. He did immediately, lest he should be Overcome with Kindnesse, return the Romans all the prisoners he had, and sent Cineas again to obtaine peace and friendship. It seemed dishonourable to receive a gift from the enemy, where- by they might be thought to have abhorred wickedness more for gain then for the love of Ver- tue, they therefore sent back an equal number of Tarentines and Samnites that their captives might not be receivd gratis. This publick abstinence was to their greater Credit seconded by the vertue and resolution of private persons; when the gifts of Pyrrhus (which Cineas in great Number and those very pretious had Carried to Rome for both sexes) were refused not only by the Men but by the women. For when upon the refusal of some, he profer'd them to others, and others again, there was not so much as one man or woman to be found so mean or covetous as to open a door for the Receipt of a Kings gift. The Former answer was now again returned to the Embassadors, That until Pyrrhus had quitted Italy, they would esteem him an Enemy to the people of Rome. While Pyrrhus was much perplexed at these passages, not know- ing how to prosecute the War with any cheerefulness, nor willing to depart Italy with any losse of Reputation, the Sicilian affaires did seem to help him, the management whereof (after long and doubtfull deliberation) he resolved to undertake. For so he thought the Roman war might with credit be declined, and the command of a most Rich Island obtained, he had also an earnest desire of being revenged on the Carthaginians, as being first provoked by them. For they suspecting the Kings designs, had a little before hand sent Mago with a Navy of an hundred and twenty ships, saying, The Romans ought by Forreigne aid to be assisted against a forreign enemy. And though the Romans used not their assistance, making answer, That they were not wont to undertake any War but what could be managed by their own forces; Yet now this fourth time was the League renewed between the two Commonwealths.

To the former Articles it was added, That whether the Romans or Carthaginians made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be specially excepted, that they might assist one the other, which soever of them were provoked to War; And, that when either had need of the others help, the Carthagi- nians should provide ships, each party pay their own souldiers, the Carthaginians aid the Romans by sea, but not be compelled against their wills out of their ships. Which being agreed upon, Mago went to Pyrrhus under pretence of treating of peace, but indeed to discover the Kings Counsels, whom the Carthaginians had understood to be invited into Sicily: And they offer'd their Navy to the Romans not so much out of any good will or care of their safety, but further to involve Pyrrhus in his Italian War, lest he should spoil their successes in Sicily which flou- rished so prosperously. They had then also guarded the passage into Sicily with a numerous fleet, pretending the siege of Rhegium, but indeed resolving to hinder Pyrrhus from transmit- ting his Army. For these causes did he wholly apply his mind to the Sicilian affairs, which fil- led him with great hope, as by the state of things, so by the frequent Embassies which came one after another out of the Island, affirmed, That he was desired by the prayers of all men, as the only remedy of their calamities wherewith they were more sharply afflicted then the most miserable Nation under the heavens. For after the death of Agathocles, more lamentable then undeserv- ed, one Meno, born at Agesta, a City of Sicily, who had poison'd the King, endeavouring to usurp the government, was by Hicetas the Pretor expelled the City, and fled to the Cartha- ginian forces: Hence arose an heavy war and unfortunatè to the Syracusans, by which ne- ver the less Hicetas in particular strengthened himself, and turning his forces against Phintias of Agrigentum, he held the Island long time in trouble, till by the boldness of one Thanio he was deprived of his Domination which he had held for nine years. Thanio endeavouring to re- tain the Sovereignty, was resisted by Sosistratus a Syracusan Nobleman. These two along time contested, Thanio possessing Nasus, an Island which is part of Syracuse, Sosistratus ex- ercising the Tyranny in the other parts of the City. When at length by these discords they saw nothing but destruction likely to ensue, with one consent they decreed to send for Pyr- rhus, who being the son in law of Agathocles, and next in succession, as having a son by Lanassa, was thought fittest to bear rule, as being able by his courage and his forces to settle their affairs. Moreover, the principal men of Agrigentum and Leontium, offering the Go- vernment of their Cities, and consequently of the whole Island, unanimously intreated him, To come into Sicily as soon as may be, to succour them with his presence, being wearied with la- bouring under the heavy burden of a Barbarous slavery. For the Carthaginians having wasted their grounds, had besieged the City of Syracuse, both by sea and land, with a Navy of an hundred ships, and an Army of fifty thousand men. Pyrrhus therefore without delay sendeth Cineas before (whose wisdom and faith he much trusted to) to agree upon Conditions and Articles of friendship with the Sicilian Cities. At his departure he comforted his Italian con- federates, promising, That if they were oppressed by the Romans he would in speed come out of the neighbour Island much increased with new forces. But when he was about to leave a Gar- rison in Tarentus, they taking it in ill part, desired, He would either perform his promised as- sistance on those conditions he was call'd in, or that at least he would leave their City free. They could obtain neither, Pyrrhus returning no other answer, but commanding them, To carry his leisure. The Epirot King being thus employ'd, the Consuls had the easier war against their o- ther enemies. I find they had about this time good success against the Etrurians, Lucanians, Brutians and Samnites. It appears there was no great matter done against the Etrurians, in that there was no Triumph made for that war, neither was the whole nation, but few Cities engaged, who re-assumed against the Romans those arms they had so lately laid down, being solicited by the Samnites, who found themselves left naked by the departure of Pyrrhus. other nations as the war was more heavy, so was the Victory more Illustrious over them. C. Fabricius the Consul (his Colleague, as is imagined, being gone into Etruria, inasmuch as upon the Epirots departure one Consular Army was thought sufficient) overcame the Ducanians, Brutians, Tarentines and Samnites: Some Cities, among which were Heraclea, he drew into Covenants, and over those people he Triumphed before the Ides of December.

An assembly of the people being held, New Consuls were chosen for the year ensuing, P. Cornelius Rufinus again, and C. Junius Brutus again. Other Nobles were Candidatus with Rufinus, but by Fabricius his favour he was chosen. Wherein Fabricius considering the times; preferr'd the publick safety before private quarrels; For by reason of their difference in Manners there was Enmity betweene these two, Fabricius being of prooffe against Mony was guided only by his care of the common good; Rufinus more greedy of wealth then ordinary, many times order'd his counsels and actions to his private gain. But being otherwise Industrious and a good commander, Fabricius judged him to be preferr'd before his Competitours who were far inferiour to him in Marshal affaires. 'Tis reported, when Rufinus gave him thanks, That being at enmity with him he had helped him to the Consulship, especially when so great a War was on foot; he answer'd, 'Twas not much to be wondred, if he had rather be pillag'd, then sold to the enemy. For there was great War remaining in Italy, and Pyrrhus finding all things goe according to his desire in Sicily (whether he now was gone) 'twas reasonably fear'd he would quickly return a more formidable enemy by the Accessse of the strength of so Noble an Island.

WHILE these things were doing in Italy, Pyrrhus having shipp'd his Army and Elephants, sailed from the Tarentine Port into Sicily, after he had continued two years and four moneths in Italy. Being conducted by Thanis, who met him with his Navy, he was received by the Sicilians with wonderful chearfulness, freely delivering up into his hands their Towns, their Forces, their Mony and their Ships. Being thus in a short time possess'd of the dominion of the Græcian Cities, he did also by force of arms extort from the Carthaginians all whatsoever they held, excepting only the City of Lilybaum, which the Carthaginians being helped by its convenient situation, defended against all his assaults. Whence justly conceiving great and vast hopes in his mind, he resolved, leaving his eldest son the Patrimony of his Father, to settle the other two, the one King of Italy, the other King of Sicily. Both the reputation and virtues of this King were indeed at that time very great; and the Sicilians having for many years sustained both foreign and civil wars, and a plague worse then both, the tyranny of usurpers, seemed willing with joy to entertain any indifferent Prince over them. But when, a little after, he proceeded to raise moneys against their wills, and put to death some of their Nobles, he contracted much hatred, which was encreased by the covetousness and arrogance of his Officers, whose vices did every where as much wrong him as his own; therefore next to the first and principal care Kings ought to have, of being themselves Egregiously good, 'tis for their honour and safety to make a choice of virtuous Favourites, seeing private men are blamed only for their own faults, but other mens crimes are imputed to Princes. But these things things hapned afterwards. Now at Present, while their Zeal was hot, he was with the highest Honour and magnificence received, first by Tyndarion Prince of the Taurominitans (for in that part of the Island he landed) then by the People of Catana, and so passed with his foot-Army to Syracuse. His fleet he commanded to be brought about not farre from the shore, ready prepared for fight, as thinking the Carthaginians would not suffer him to approach the City without hazard of a Battell. But it hapned, that a little before Thirty of the Carthaginian ships were upon other Employment gone from the Navy, which because they were not return'd the Admirall refused to venture on the Fight with the Rest. Wherefore-Entring without Resistance, Themion and Pisistratus yielding Possession, he took into his hands the Publick Treasure, an hundred and twenty Covered ships, Twenty open ones, their Weapons, Engines, and all other Furniture for Warre.

In the Interim came Embassadours from the Leontines, whose Prince Heraclidas offered the City and all his Forces, Four thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. Neither were other Cities slower in their submission, but came in driven as it were by a Torrent of Fortune. Pyræhus treating them all with much Humanity, and gaining their Good wills, sent every one back to his own City, entertaining now more Ample Hopes in his mind, intending if affaires proceeded so favourably to pass over into Africke. Things went not so well with his Confederates in Italy, for Milo, who was left at Tarentus with part of the Army, was not able to protect them from the hostility of the Romans, now in the absence of the King and his main strength. But as yet it was well for them that the Romans deferring a while the Tarentine warre, both the Consuls converted their forces against Samnium. The Samnites (seeing their Fields burn't, their Castles surprized, the whole burthen of the Warre to fall on them, and that they were forsaken by their Friends) being inferiour both in strength and Courage, forsaking their Townes and Villages, betook themselves to the high and craggy Mountaines, carrying with them their Wives and Children, and what things of most value they could in such a Tumult and feare convey away. Among the Romans besides the Emulation of their Commanders, there was arisen great Negligence and Carelessness (the Inseparable Companion of Prosperity) caused by their own Constant good success, and their Enemies Fear. Hereby they suffered some Loss and more Disgrace; for their souldiers confidently creeping up craggy and difficult passages were beaten back and destroy'd by the Samnites, who had possess'd themselves of advantageous places; many were slain, being overwhelmed with stones and Darts, or tumbled down the Precipices; others having no convenience either of retreating or fighting were taken alive. This Accident caused the Commanders to divide their Forces, for each laying the blame of the Misfortune upon his Colleague, boasted he could have managed the business with better success if he had been alone. C. Junius with his Legions remained in Samnium, P. Cornelius drew out his forces against the Lucanians and Brutians, where carrying about the Terror of his Armes, wasting the Grounds and burning the Villages, he had occasion offer'd of greater Attempts. In the utmost parts of the Italian shore, towards the East and the Ionian sea, where the promontory of Lacium stretcheth forth it self, is seated Croton of old very famous, and now also considerable for it's Wealth. Through the midst of it in those dayes ran the River Esarus, on each side whereof the Multitude of Buildings were encompassed with a wall of Twelve miles circumference. This City the Consul not daring to beleagure, had thoughts of obtaining by Treachery, for he was put in hopes by many of the Roman faction there, that if he would timely advance his forces to the walls of it, being now destitute of forreign Aide, he might easily take it by the help and assistance of those who were weary of Pyræhus his Domination. But it hapned about that time that either out of fear of the Enemies Neighbourhood, or suspicion of Treason, which is seldom long hid, the Crotonians had procured aid from Milo: Nicomachus came to them with a strong band of Lucanians, who issuing out upon the Consul (not aware of any thing, but confidently coming up to the walls without fear of Danger) bear him back with the slaughter and wounding of many of his Men. Rufinus desiring by Counsell to remedy that loss he had by his Rashness sustained, on set purpose encreaseth the Rumour of his Overthrow, and that he might seem stricken with the greater fear pretends to desert from his Enterprize, commanding the Baggage to be pack'd up as for a sudden Departure. This News was quickly blaz'd about the City (as from a Camp so neer must needs be) and besides a probable cause of the business, their Credulity was help'd forward by their desire to have it so; when on a sudden (their mindes being already thus inclin'd) a certain Captive (being thereunto suborned by the Consul, in hope of Liberty and further Reward) comes into the City, as if in this hasty departure of the Romans he had taken opportunity to Escape; He informes them that Cornelius Rufinus, having no strength enough to force Croton, was gone to Locri, being invited by some who promised to betray it to him. By and by comes another who confirming the former news, added moreover, That the Romans were now on their March. And withall they discover his Ensignes and Troopes moving that way which leadeth to Locri. Nicomachus being deluded by this Wile, marcheth swiftly with his forces the nearest way to Locri, intending likewise to defend it, which when Rufinus by secret Messengers understood, he turneth back presently to Croton, as upon better advice, so with better success then before. His diligence was made prosperous, not only by the security of his Enemies, but by the favour of Fortune also, for a thick mist chanced to surround him, so that he was almost within the walls with his Victorious army before the Crotonians understood he was returned. The joy of this victory, of it self ample enough, was abundantly increased by other as glorious successes; Fortune seldom observing a mean on either hand. For Nicomachus perceiving himself to have fallen into a remediless Error, not knowing what to doe, as he returned to Tarentum, was met by Rufinus, lost great part of his men, and very hardly escaped himself with the Rest; When not being content to defend one Citie he lost two. For the Locrians likewise being animated with this success, having slain the garrison Pyrrhus left among them, with the governour of it, whose oppression they could no longer endure, betook themselves to the friendship of the Romans. Notwithstanding this Proceffe of affaires, the Samnites and other nations were not so far dejected, but that still they resolved to endure the worst that Fortune could bring upon them, encouraged, beside their own innate obstinacy, with their Hops of Pyrrhus's Returne, hearing the news of his victorys in Sicily. For Pyrrhus (that we may relate his actions out of Italy also, which were performed in those times and places, having influence upon and being joyned with the Roman affaires) having settled things at Syracuse and Leontium, went about the same time with his Army to Aggrigentum, meeting Messengers by the way with News, that the Carthaginian Garison was thrust out of the City, and that the Aggrigentines yielded themselves and all they had into his protection; which accordingly at his coming they did. For Sosistratus (who had delivered up Syracuse to him) together with the Citie, presented him with eight thousand foote, proper young men, and eight hundred horse, a force nothing inferior to the Epirots Pyrrhus brought with him. Thirty other Cities, which Sosistratus had the command of, did by his means submit themselves to the Kings discretion.

These things thus transacted, he sent to Syracuse for all sorts of weapons and engines, which were of use in the siege of Cities. For now his design was to assault the Cities under the Carthaginian Jurisdiction, having an army of thirty thousand, besides fiftene hundred horse, and the Elephants he brought over into Sicily. The first he tooke was Heraclea, where was a Punicke garrison, then Arone; After which the Seluntians, Halicyeans, and Egestians following his fortune forsook the Carthaginian party, giving an Example to many other Townes in the same quarter of doing the like. The Erycines, confiding in the number of their Auxiliaries and strength of the place, he was resolved with all his power to assault, having therefore order'd his men, himselfe armed, coming up toward the walls, Vowed a Vow to Hercules, if that day he should manifest himself to the Gracians a Warriour worthy of the Race he came of and the office he bore. After the siege was given, and that the defendants, with a cloud of arrowes being driven from their stations, gave way to the placing ladders upon the walls, the King himselfe first of all men entred into a most noble fight against all opposers, tumbling some down with his sheild, slaying others with his sword, and terrifying all with the greatness of his Courage and strength; neither was this fight more glorious to him, then in every consideration prosperous; for without receiving any wound, with great honour he gained the Citie at that one storm, his souldiers being no lesse animated by his Example then feareful of his danger, for both which reasons they fought with the greater contention. He then did sacrifice to Hercules according to his vow, and for many days exhibited Plays and Shows of severall kinds in great Magnificence and Pompe. In this year I find there was a Triumph at Rome over the Lucanians and Brutians before the Nones of January. But I wonder to find it ascribed to C. Iunius, seeing Rufinus his Province was amongst them, and that he tooke two famous Cities, and that other Authours stile him a Triumphal Man.

Rome being not very secure, considering the progress of Pyrrhus his affairs, was otherwise much terrified with Prodiges and Pestilence; The most horrid Omen was, that the statue of Jupiter Capitolinus being smitten with Thunder, the head thereof was stricken off and carried quite away, neither could it be found but by the art and care of the South-sayers. The Plague likewise committed great slaughter amongst them, taking away man and beast by a common Murrain, but was most formidable in Abortion, for there was no young ones almost of man or beast which came forth safe and entire, insomuch as it was belived the anger of the gods would consume all living creatures. Which Affliction made the other Consulship of Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgis very famous, wherein he had C. Genucius Chlopsa for his Colleague. And yet they left not off their war against the Samnites and Lucanians, and two certain arguments there are that they made great slaughter of their enemies, for the same year Q. Fabius the Consul Triumphed over the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians in the Quirinals; and those people sent Letters to Pyrrhus and Embassadors, declaring, They were intirely and intirely without speedy help; that they could no longer sustain the power of the Romans, but must of necessity prevent the uttermost extremity by yielding up themselves. This thing much inclined Pyrrhus to depart the Island and transport his forces again into Italy, seeing also his affairs now to be more difficult in Sicily, by reason the affections of men grew cold; and, by the consideration of some injuries received, were turned into hatred against him.

Which his resolution, and the series of ensuing affairs, that they may the better be understood, I have thought good more at large to relate his Actions at the present. When therefore he had possessed himself of Eryx, and placed a Garison in it, he marched to the City of the Egins which is of a very convenient situation, near the Haven of Panormus, and well fenced with works; there being received with the good will of the Citizens, he removed his Camp

Camp to Panormus it self, which received its name from the fair and ample haven which leadeth to it: This he took by force, and having likewise taken a place called Epiriste, seated in a pleasant mountain, but upon hard passages, between Panormus and Eryx, he had now the possession of all the Carthaginian Province, excepting only Lilybaum. This City was lately built by the Carthaginians, as an habitation for the Moxians, whose town Dionysius the Tyrant had in the Punick War demolished. Wherefore the Carthaginians, seeing that of all their dominions in Sicily, their hopes were confin'd to this only place, resolv'd with their utmost strength to defend it against the preparations they understood Pyrrhus made for the siege of it. Wherefore bringing in thither a considerable strength of Souldiers, with plentiful provision, as likewise amunition of all sorts (which they had opportunity enough to do, having the command of the seas) they diligently adhibited all care possible to fence it on every side: Especially where it lay open to the land they erected many Forts and Towers, encompassed with large ditche: Their work was the sooner finished, in regard the town being for the most part of it built upon the Rocks of the sea, needed no artificial Bulwarks in those places. Now, though they made great preparations for the War, and had hired many forces, as from other Countries, so from Italy also; yet they sent Embassadors, promising, If they could obtain peace upon equal conditions, to assist him with money and ships. Pyrrhus would hear no mention of money, desiring only to retain those Cities he had taken, seeming willing to allow them the possession of Lilybaum. But the Kings friends, and the Sicilian Princes enforming him, That so long as the Carthaginians held Lilybaum, (as a ladder ready prepared whereby to scale all the rest of Sicily) the Island would never be void of the fear of them; caused him to return answer, That there was but this one condition of peace he would agree to, to wit, That they should clearly quit Sicily, and suffer the sea to be the bounds of either's dominions. The hopes of peace being thus broken off, he draweth his forces forth with toward the City, and Marshalling his army not far from the walls, in such order as those who were tired might (by turns) be relieved by fresh men, he began the assault. But the Lilybæans having a sufficient number of souldiers to defend them, and being provided of Engines and Amunition kept the City safe. For the Carthaginians had brought into many Catapults and Scorpions that the whole compass of the walls was not able to receive them.

When therefore a shower of all sorts of weapons and darts overwhelmed the Kings Men, slaying many and wounding more, they desisted from their Enterprize. Pyrrhus likewise set himself to work to make Engines of Bateria; beside those he brought from Syracuse, and digging Mines under ground, he attempted all arts belonging to a siege: But the Carthaginians stoutly resisting, when he had for almost two months wearied himself in vaine, and saw that the besieged having free egress and regress at Sea, the City could not be taken, he broke up his siege and employ'd his forces other where. For some Greek Cities, besides other heavy oppressions, being compelled to pay tribute, implored his assistance against the Mamertines, living upon the sea coast. Pyrrhus therefore leading his Army in halt, when he had taken and slain some Mamertines he found gathering Taxes in those places; Encountering their main body proved Conquerour, and took by force and demolish'd many of their Garrison. And hitherto the King by his illustrious performances had obtained great Power and Honour, having beside his other Vertues, with his singular Humanity not only won, but deserved the Love and Affections of the Cities. But this so great Felicity, which one would think so firmly grounded, was in a moment destroy'd, as by that Levity of Mind which was never wanting in this people, and by the Intemperance of his friends, so chiefly by the Kings own fault. Who, being in adversity irreprehensibly good, was puffed up with pride in his prosperity, in which Condition Mens minds are indeed generally found to be weakest. When therefore, as we have said, he esteemed a Fleet necessary for the accomplishment of his undertaking, and that though he had many ships, yet they were not well furnish'd with Sea-men, he very much offended the City with a strict Prefect Sea-men; being now on a sudden changed, and from his former gentleness proceeding to proud commands, threats and extreme punishments; these things nevertheless were tolerated, as having the pretence of publick good. But, when they saw those very men to be slain, by whose good will and assistance chiefly he had obtained Sicily, many people, not by degrees, or interposing delays, but on the sudden changing their minds, revolted from his friendship, and applied themselves (as for every one was most opportune) some to the Carthaginians, some to the Mamertines. So that cruelty, which when it is alone is always grievous, doth then become utterly intolerable, when being exercised against the well-deserving, it contracteth (beside the hatred properly due to it self) the detestation of an unthankful and perfidious mind. He seemeth to have brought himself to this necessity of governing by violence, being too much over-ruled by the naughty Affections and counsels of his own men, for unto them (being no whit better) did he bestow the riches which were sequestred from the friends and kinsmen of Agathocles. The chief Magistracies of Cities he committed to his Pensioners and Captains, not according to the statutes and customs of the Cities, nor for the due time prescribed, but in what manner, and for as long as he pleased. Law suits, and controversies, and the whole administration of publick busineses he assumed to himself, referring many to his Familiars and Favourites, who were hateful for their avarice and luxury, a like intent upon gaining and spending money by wicked arts, who being greedy to satisfy their own lust, make no distinction between between Right and Wrong. Mens mindes being hereby incensed they begun first to murmur, afterward openly to Complain, why they had repented of their former Condition, if now the very same things were to be born withall? that in vain was Pyrrhus invited and received; if he studied to imitate those manners he came to punish; that no injury can possibly be of so sharp sense and Apprehension, as that whereof he is the Author who ought to have been the Avenger. And now many began not very obscurely to move sedition, and cause a Revolution of things, whereas he hearkning to pernicious Counsell, chose rather to encrease causes of Offence, then take them away: as if what evil was by Injustice committed, were by Cruelty to be mended. In the meane time the Carthaginians, observing that Pyrrhus was not very strong in his own Country forces, and was daily less affected by the Sicilians, conceiving hopes of recovering their lost Province, had sent over an new Army which found busines enough for the Epirots, many flying over to them who stood in fear of Pyrrhus's cruelty. Pyrrhus under pretence of the Punick War, introducing Garrisons into the Cities, resolved by false accusations of Treason to take away the lives of the greatest men, thinking afterward the more easily to keep the people in awe. At length he aimed at Thenio and Sosistratus, the principal men of the whole Island, by whose assistance chiefly (as we have declared) he obtained the command of Sicily. Thenio was slain, Sosistratus fled to the enemy, affording him no lesse help and authority to the casting Pyrrhus out of Sicily, then he had before to the bringing him in and confirming him there.

Upon this many Cities revolting, greater part to the Carthaginians, some to the Mamertines, Pyrrhus his affairs were reduced from a most flourishing Condition to a very narrow and evil state. In this Conjunction the embassage of his Italian confederates came not unwelcome to him, complaining, That having lost all things, they had very few Cities left which were able with much ado to keep the Enemy from entering their walls. This gave him a faire and honourable Pretence of departing, that he might seeme, not expelled out of Sicily by the Carthaginians, But to return into Italy for the Relief of his oppressed associates. Being now just going, when he seriously considered the situation and wealth of the Island, and disposition of the Inhabitants, O (saith he) what a fair field do we leave the Romans and Carthaginians to fight in for Superiority! And his Prefage proved true, as was witnessed by the wars suddenly ensuing, wherein so many Navies were destroyed, and Armies routed.

But the Enemies Courage increasing with their Fortune, Pyrrhus had neither a safe departure out of Sicily, nor a quiet Voyage to the Tarentines in Italy. The Carthaginians assaulting him in his Passage cross the sea, sunk seventy of his ships, and made the rest useles (the Epirots almost utterly unskilful in Maritime affaires, being not able to grapple with men of such Experience therein) so he fled out of the Fight with Twelve ships into Italy, who had come thence, with above an hundred, besides a greater number of ships of Burthen. But gathering together those souldiers who made a shift from the Overthrow to escape to shore, he had presently a strength so great that he conceived hopes of taking Rhegium by storme. But being beaten off by the Campanians who defended it, he presently fell into a great danger. For as he led his Army through blind and difficult passages, the Enemy out of Ambush fell upon his Reare, and slew a great Number of his Men, with two Elephants. 'Twas no contemptible force, neither for Number nor the quality of the Warriours, which thus assaulted him; they were little less then ten thousand old souldiers, most of them Mamertines, who trusting in their friendship and cognation with the Rhegians, having understood that Pyrrhus intended to return for Italy, had crossed the sea before him, and in hope of prey had privily disposed of themselves in advantageous places to make a sudden irruption upon him.

Pyrrhus, according to his wonted Boldnesse fighting in the front of his Battell, received a wound in his head, which when he was gone aside to dress, one of the enemies of large stature, and gallant in his Armour, advancing before the rest of his Fellows, Challeng'd him with a loud Voice, bidding him, If he were a live, to come forth. Pyrrhus burning with anger, and Terrible in Countenance, the blood running about his face, his men not being able to hold him, made a sudden assault upon him, and with a blow on his head struck him to the ground. 'Tis reported, his sword was so well temper'd and his Arme so strong, that at one stroke he cleft the Man in sunder, even from the head to the bottom of his body, his parts on each side divided falling to the ground. The enemy terrified with the strange novelty of this spectacle, and admiring him as above the ordinary Rank of Men, left off the fight. Pyrrhus, being rid of this trouble, had notwithstanding little joy. For, inasmuch as he now lost part of his Carriages, and that the wealth he had gather'd by the spoils of the Sicilians, was lost in his last fight with the Carthaginians, he was in great want of moneys, so that his souldiers murmuring for pay, knowing not how elsewhere to provide it, he was compell'd to seize upon the Treasury of Proserpine: Her Church at Locri was in those dayes most famous for the Reputation of its holiness; which town, when Pyrrhus had taken by the assistance of his faction within it, he committed many horrid facts by slaughter and rapine, more then the just revenge of his slain Garrison did require. But there being nothing left which men would or could contribute to him, he laid hands on the holy money, being urged thereunto by his worst friends, who had most commonly been the authors of every pernicious counsel: These were Evagorus the son of Theodoros, Balacer the son of Nicandar, and Dinarchus the son of Nicias. They did not only per-swade Pyrrhus, telling him that all things must yield to Necessity, but were themselves instruments in the sacrifice, digging up a vast summe of Gold, which had many years been preserved in vaults under ground. Pyrrhus rejoicing said, there is nothing more foolish then unseasonable Devotion, and not to accept of Money ready prepar'd to one's hand is the part of a mad man. And putting it into his ships he gave order to have it carried to Tarentus, himself going by land.

But this his fact was not more soule in the Commission, then it was unhappy in the Issue. A storme suddenly arising upon the change of Wind, in the night time, turned about the ships in the dark; breaking some into pieces, and forcing others into the Maine. The ships which conveyed the Holy Money being shatter'd and torne into pieces, were sunk with all the men in them, but the money it selfe lying upon some loose planks, was by the waves carried to the shore very neer the Temple, from whence it was the day before taken. Pyrrhus understanding the Accident, commanded the money to be diligently gather'd up and returned to its former place, thinking thereby to appease the Angry Deity. Nevertheless, henceforward he had no better success, Fortune Eluding all his Designs whatsoever, even those which were upon good advice, and Virtuoussly undertaken. Which he did alwayes after constantly impute to the Anger of the Offended Goddess, as Proximus the writer of his History, and himself in his Commentary do affirme; and when the thing was newly done, not being able by many Sacrifices to make propitiation to Proserpina, he put to death all the Authors of that unhappy Counsell, the instruments of the Fact, and every one who had but lightly consented to the Commission of it. And these being executed according to their Deserts, Pyrrhus prosecuting his Design had afterward a quiet journey to Tarentus; The Romans being still more afflicted with the Plague, and fearing a new war upon Pyrrhus his return into Italy, attempted all Meanes both Divine and Humane for their Reliefe. 'Twas an old opinion, that the Pestilence might be stay'd by the Dictatours strikeing in of a Naile; for the Experiment of which hopes 'tis probable that P. Cornelius Rufinus was chosen Dictatour, for as the greatness of the Calamity might well provoke them to try all Remedies, so we find that Rufinus was the year after taken notice of by the Censours, when he had been twice Consull and twice Dictatour, neither can there be found a more certain monument of, or a more convenient place for that his Dictatourship. Against the sickness providing what Remedy they could, their Chiefest care and diligence was required in matter of Armes, especially in regard of the Difficulty in raising Men. For besides the length of the Warre, the continuance of the Pestilence had made men weary of entering into action, inasmuch as the young Men did with wonderful Obstinacy decline the service. But the severity and constancy of M. Curius Dentatus the second time Consull overcame this their wilfulness, for he now had entred the Magistracy with L. Cornelius Lentulus his Colleague: When therefore in the Capitoll he first began his Leavy, because no man answered, he caused the names of all the Tribes to be cast into an Urne, and the Pollian Tribe coming out first, he caused the first man of that Tribe whose name was drawn to be summon'd, and when he refused to appear, he sequestred and sold his Goods; when afterwards he appealed to the Tribunes complaining of the Consulls Injustice, he sold him also, saying, The Commonwealth had no need of such Citizens who knew not how to obey. The Tribunes nevertheless did not relieve him, and afterward the example being judged very wholesom grew into Custome, that when a Leavy was rightly and duly made, he who would not be a souldier should be sold for a slave. Others being terrified by this Precedent did the more readily give in their Names, and having filled up their Legions both the Consulls marched into the Enemies Country; Lentulus into Lucania, Curius into Samnium. Pyrrhus having intelligence of their motion, mustered his army at Tarentus, and found himself almost twenty Thousand strong in Foot, together with three thousand horse.

With these and the choice young men of the Tarentines he entred Samnium, but found not the Inhabitants so obedient as heretofore, they came not in so freely and readily as they had done, not only because their courage was over-wearied with the great and many losses they had sustained, but because they were justly exasperated, imputing all their calamities to Pyrrhus, which they had not suffered, had not he by his departure into Sicily betrayed his Italian associates. Nevertheless he gathered together so great a strength, that he sent one part into Lucania to busie the other Consul, while himself encountered Man. Curius, thinking if he once overcame him, he should easily complete his Victory over the rest. But the Roman very well understanding, that there is no Battalia comparable to the Macedonian Phalanx, when it hath Rome to spread and expatiate it self, kept himself in craggy and difficult places; and because he expected help from Lucania, and that the Auguries also and Entrails of beasts promised no good success, he declined fight as much as might be: so much the more earnest was Pyrrhus to engage before the two Consullar Armies were joyned together. Chusing therefore out of his Army those who were most forward, he resolv'd to assaule the Roman Camp in the night time, when he might not be discovered. But while he prepared all things for his intended purpose, he fell into a deep sleep and dreamt, that the greater part of his Teeth fell out, and that an abundance of blood flow'd out of his mouth, in consideration whereof being much perplex'd, he intended to desist from his enterprize; but his friends earnestly perswading him, Left he should never again have the same opportunity offer'd him, he gave order to advance. Male-

Maleventum (for that was the name of it in those dayes) are Mountainous and Woody places, which by degrees stretching themselves into somewhat more even ground, at length end in a very fair and open plain which is called by the name of the Taurasine Fields.

Plutarch

Now Pyrrhus beginning his journey from the Lower grounds up to the hills and woods, when his lights failed, was wildred for want of knowledg in the wayes, in so much that (the day breaking) he was discovered from the Roman camp. The Romans being moved at the unexpected approach of the enemy, yet, (because there was no doubt made but fight they must, and their sacrifices now proving more favourable) with the Consul's conduct cheerefully issued out, and falling upon the foremost of the enemy, (who were far from the Main body, and not in very good order) drove them backward, killing no small number of men, and taking some Elephants which the enemy left behind. This successe encouraged Curius, to follow his Fortune and descend into the open field in Battel-array prepared to fight. Neither did the Epirots make any delay. The encounter was very fierce and furious on both sides, but the Romans having had the upper hand in the late skirmish, were much fuller of Courage and hopes. The Epirots giving back, Pyrrhus now again sought Refuge from his Elephants, and thereby (one of his own wings flying) he forced one of the Romans Wings to retire even to their Reserve. There had the Consul placed a strong force (resolving upon this occasion to engage himself) which he commanded, being now fresh, to renew the fight, and beat back the Elephants. Former experience had taught them an easie and ready way to oppose these beasts, that they were sooner diverted by fire then the sword: Against them therefore were provided Iron instruments involved in much Pitch and Tar, which, being set on fire, were darted upon the backs and Towers of the Elephants, and whether they light on the skin of the beasts, or on the wood of the Towers, they stuck fast by reason of their hooked sharp points. These instruments and divers sorts of darts, being flung from the upper ground, drove the Elephants into fury, partly by terror, partly by the pain of their wounds, so that their masters not being able to govern them, they rushed back upon their own battel, filling it with fear and slaughter. The beginning of this Rout is reported to be by a young Elephant, which being wounded in his head, sent forth a querulous noise, at which known voice the Dam was first startled, and she increasing the tumult, at length the rest were all in confusion and turned into flight. Very remarkable was this fight, both for the number of the slain and the fruit of the victory. For Pyrrhus being hereby utterly overthrown, neither did the rest of Italy long hold out, neither, after Italy, was any other Nation and King able to stand against them. 'Tis said the King in that Battel had thrice the number of the Romans, even fourscore thousand foot, and six thousand horse; of these they who report the most say, six and thirty thousand were slain, they who report the least say six and twenty thousand; thirteen hundred were taken prisoners, and eight Elephants. Pyrrhus with a few horsemen escaped to Tarentum. The Camp of Pyrrhus being taken, as it caused admiration, so was it of great use to the Romans. For they heretofore, as other people, ordered their Camp scatteringly by companies in the manner of Cottages: Pyrrhus is held to be the first who rightly measuring and dividing spaces, contained the whole Army within one Trench; and by his example the Romans being assisted, and adding what they thought convenient, attained to that most perfect manner of pitching their Camps which afterwards they used.

This year was very famous, not only for their happy war abroad, but by reason also of Domesticke affairs, and the notable severity of their City Discipline. Q. Fabricius Luscinus, and Q. Emilius Papus, being Censors together, took away from many the Publick horses, and passed by many in calling the Senate. But most remarkable was Cornelius Rufinus his note of Infamy, who having been twice Consul and twice Dictator, was ejected the Senate by the Censors, and this reason given of his Punishment, That they found in his house the weight of ten pounds in plate so serve at meals: And in this Condition not only himself but his Family for a long time remained, whereof not any one attained to the highest honours, before Sylla the Dictator.

Such was the Parsimony of this Citie in those dayes, and afterward so great the extravagancy, that it was by the Fathers condemned as an argument of intolerable Luxury, what their children would shortly esteem but a base and contemptible piece of household stuffe: Every mans estate being cessed and valued, the Army was purged by sacrifices; there were cessed two hundred seventy one thousand, two hundred twenty four Citizens. Both Consuls entred the Capitoll in triumph, first Curius, whose triumph was the more illustrious, as for the same of his Exploits, and great joy of his victory, so did it exceed in Pomp and splendour. For heretofore their triumphs being over poor People their neighbours, were set out only with broken armes and Gallick waggons; nor any spoiles led but flockes and herds of Cattel. But now there was a worthy shew both for the varietie of Nations which were led Captive before the Chariot, and for the Beauty and Magnificence of the spoils. Epirots, Thessalians, Macedonians, Apulians, Lucanians, Brutians were led Bound, there were carried Painted Tables, the works of choice and rare Artificers, Gold, Purple, with other beyond sea rarietie, and the instrument of the Tarentine Luxury. But the most wonderful and joyfull spectacle were the Elephants with their four Towers on their backs, (for the rest were dead of their wounds) This was the first time they were ever seen at Rome; the common people called them Luca-Bulls, giving them their name from the creature they were hitherto best acquainted with, and their deno-denomination from the place they first saw them in; within few dayes after was the other Consuls Triumph nothing so gallant; though his performances were not to be despised; he had overthrown the Samnites and Lucanians, and taken many Townes, but in comparison of Curius his Glory the Esteem of these things were not so high. Among the rest who had Rewards beflow'd on them for their Courage, he gave to Ser. Cornelius Merenda a Crown of Gold out of the spoiles, because by his help chiefly a Certain Town of the Samnites was taken. While the Romans thus enjoy'd the comfort of their Victories, the Enemy was in a far different posture. They had been long weary of Pyrrhus his Domination, but now after this unhappy fight, their mindes were so filled with fear and Indignation that they could take no Rest.

Plin. 33. 2.

The King having been a long time averse from the Roman Warre, now utterly despairing of the Conquest, thought of nothing more then how to get safely and honourably out of Italy.
But keeping his Counsell to himselfe, he encouraged his Associates, That they should not be cast down by one unluckly Overthrow, that they had not received so much loss by the last fight, as by the former they had caused to the Romans, who notwithstanding could not be perswaded to Peace upon equal Conditions; That now they should imitate the Roman Constancy, and reserve themselves for better fortune, and all would yet go well; That there is yet strength sufficient left, whereby to maintain a long Warre; That in Greece he had many Potent Friends, from whom he might certainly expect succour. Neither were these things incredible, For he had already, especially by Ptolomy (who was then King of Macedon) been manifestly assisted; he being then in great Estimation both among Greeks and Barbarians, being much honour'd by the Etolians (then a most powerful Nation) as also by the Macedonians and the Kings of Illyrium, having obliged some by Courtesies, others by Fear. Yet all his boasting was more with intent, to retain his Confederates (now ready to revolt) in Fidelity, till the seas were open for his Returne, then to continue the Warre in Italy, or that he put any Trust in Forreign Aid. Sending nevertheless his Embassadors to the Kings of Asia and Macedonia, of some he craved moneys, of others Men, of Antigonus (who was then King of Macedon) he craved both. With these hopes keeping his associates firme to him (having in the mean time underhand provided all things for his Departure) his Embassadors now returned from Antigonus. Assembling therefore his own and the Italian Princes, he read unto them not those Letters which now he received, but others which came before from Antigonus, promising plentifull Assistance suddenly to be sent. By this Craft having deluded both his own Associates, as also the Romans who garrison'd near him, the night following without any hindrance he hoysed saile, and made the Cerapian Mountaines a Promontory of Ephrus. But that he might seem not dishonourably to have relinquished the war, and ingenerate a beliefe of his Return after he had accomplished the Design he was call'd aside for, he left behind him Milo to defend the Castle of Tarentus, and that he might not only by hope of Reward, but by fear of the like Punishment, continue faithfull, he gave him a seat whose cover was made of Nicias his skin; whom he had put to death for his Treason against him. Leaving therefore with him a garrison of souldiers, with the Rest (to wit eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse) he returned into his Kingdom, having been six yeares absent. At Rome not knowing but that Pyrrhus would renew the warre, they did at their Assembly choose Marcius Consul again, because he onely having had good success against the King, was thought like to carry on the warre with greatest Authority, and best fortune, of the Patricians Ser. Cornelius Merenda was chosen, being promoted by his late purchased honour, and the Commendation of his Countreymen, under whose command he was last year; These being made Consul, converted the heat of the warre against the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, who defending themselves rather by the Difficulty of Places then by Armes, gave no occasion of any Memorable action like the former. Neither was Curius his Glory hereby diminished; everyone still judging, that that Valiant K. Pyrrhus fled not so much for the overthrow sustain'd, as fearing such a Captain as Curius now again coming forth against him. To him therefore was attributed the Glory of having chased Pyrrhus out of Italy, and finishing the Warre. In that year which followed Curius his Third Consulship, there came Embassadors from the Alexandrian Kings with gifts to Rome, and in the Consulship of C. Dorso and C. Claudius Canina, Ptolomeus Phila- delphus hearing of Pyrrhus his flight, sent to congratulate with the Romans, and to desire to be Esteemed their Friend and Associate. The Romans thought it very honourable that their Friendship was sought by Kings so Potent and farre distant, therefore courteously receiving and entertaining the Embassadors, they agreed to enter League with Ptolomeus, for the Confirmation whereof, and to return the like Kind office to the Kings, they sent Embassadors to him chosen out of their Principal Men, of the Consuls L. Fabius Gurgés, and with him C. Fabius Pictor, and Numerius Fabius Pictor, and L. Ogulnius. These being gone, the Consuls had good success against the Italian People, who still out of Necessity and Despaire kept up their Armes. The Triumph which Claudius Canina made in the Quirinalls over the Luca- nians, Samnites and Brutians, is an Argument, that his Actions were of the greater Consequence: But the Joy of all this Prosperity was somewhat diminish'd by Sexilia a Vestall Virgin, who against the Rules of her Order being found guilty of Incest, was thought to provoke the Anger of the Gods.

But appeasing the gods by Sacrifices and Ceremonies, they turned the punishment on the head of the delinquent, and buried her alive at the Colline Gate. While the same men were Consuls there were Colonies planted, Cusa among the Volscians, and in Lucania Paestum, which the Greeks call Pesidenia; this City the Lucanians had taken from the Sybarites, and from them it lately came under the jurisdiction of the Romans. The memory of the year following is more notable, as putting an end not only to the war of the Samnites and others, but of the Tarentines also. L. Papirius Cursor, and Sp. Carvilius the second time Consuls, having Lucania, Samnium, with the Brutians and Tarentines for their Provinces, did by their wisdom and worthy deeds fulfil the expectation of all men, for indeed this pair of Consuls was on purpose chosen in hope of finishing the War this year. The Samnites being conquer'd by Carvilius the seventy first year after the war first began, did now with greater faithfulness receive the conditions of Peace imposed on them. Lu. Papirius with great slaughter having overcome the Brutians and Lucanians, compelled them to sue for peace. But (as it happens in one main war against many neighbouring People, the confines of whose Territories were interchangeably mixed) Papirius had to do also with the Samnites, Carvilius with the Brutians and Lucanians, and both of them with the Tarentines. Neither were the forces only of the Tarentines routed and put to flight, but their City also recover'd into obedience. Which business ought to be the more punctually related, because, besides the Victory of a most famous City, it comprehendeth the death of Pyrrhus, the subtilty of the Carthaginians, and the first beginning of emulation between them and the Romans.

Pyrrhus, when two years since he sailed from Italy, left a Garrison in the Castle of Tarentum, thereby to beget hopes of his return, which afterward being the more confidently expected by reason of his success in Macedonia, did strengthen the minds of the Italians against their present losses. For being a man of a fierce stirring spirit, not able long to rest, he had made war upon Antigonus, because he sent him no assistance into Italy, and overcoming him in a set battel, had almost driven him out of his Kingdom. Whence the Romans were in perpetual fear lest he should return into Italy with a more numerous Army, and renew the war more heavily then before. But his unexpected death did suddenly cut off both his hopes and fears of all men. For being insatiably desirous of encreasing his power, under pretence of settling Cleomenis in his Kingdom of Sparta (being then at odds with Aras) he entred Peloponnesus with a purpose to keep it in his own hands; and though he did in vain assault their City, yet he afflicted the Lacedemonians with great calamities: In Argos, in the mean time, there being two Factions, Aristippus the head of the one called in Antigonus, Aristias Patron of the other invited Pyrrhus to his relief and for the putting down his adversary. For Antigonus was also come into Peloponnesus to assist the Lacedemonians against the common enemy. In the same night at divers Ports were both the Kings forces admitted into the City by the Argives. Pyrrhus understanding his men were hard put to it, entred the City himself, and beholding a Brass Statue of a Wolf and a Bull as fighting, was presently possessed with an opinion of his approaching death. For he was informed by an antient Oracle, That that place would prove fatal to him where he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting; he was therefore resolved to draw back his forces and retreat out of the City. But the Elephants and souldiers coming in to his succour, meeting Helenus the son of Pyrrhus, quite stopped up the passage, so that some striving to go out, some to come in, the enemy likewise sore pressing upon those who gave back, the Argives, Macedonians, Epirots and Lacedemonians who came along with Aras, some Elephants also, all crowding and being crowded one by another in narrow streets, caused great fear and tumult amongst them.

Pyrrhus in the midst of all, every where endeavouring to protect his own, and beat back the enemy (giving advice, crying out with his voice and lifting up his hand) was by a certain young man of Argos lightly wounded with a spear. This young man's mother a poor old woman (sitting among others upon the house top to behold the fight) when she saw Pyrrhus in fury and violence setting upon him who wounded him, being astonished at her son's danger, suddenly snatched up a Tile, and with both her hands flung it down on the Kings head. So miserable and void of honour was Pyrrhus his death, then whom that Age brought not forth any man more worthy, either for Courage of Mind, Soundness in Counsel or Skill in Marshal affairs, besides many other endowments both of Soul and Body. But by his Ambition he destroy'd the fruit of all his Labours, and defaced the Ornaments of his Virtue; he would have been much more happy if contented with his own fortune; and certainly the most potent Prince living had he used as much Wisdom and Circumspection in keeping what he got, as did Valour and Industry in the acquiring.

This news, being brought into Italy, did diversly, according to their several Affections, cause joy in some Cities, and sorrow in others. Other People who were at their own disposal, bought their Peace of the Romans upon what termes they could; But the Garrison of the Epirots, and Miso governour of the Castle restrained the Tarentines from using their Liberty. Between whom, by degrees from lighter injuries and Reproaches, at length brake out open Enmity; so that the Tarentines being on each hand pressed with great Difficulties, having the Romans their Enemies without the walls, and the Epirots within, sent Embassadors to crave succour from Carthage. The Carthaginians, who possessed great part of Sicily and wished the Coast-

Coast-Towns of Italy rather in their own hands than the Romans, readily came with a mighty Navy, pretending only to cast out Milo; but resolving, if they gained Tarentus, to maintain it against the Romans. When therefore L. Papirius the Consul was also come, Tarentus was shut up on all sides, the Romans beleaguering that part of the Citie and Castle by land, the Carthaginians besieging the same Castle by sea. The Romans, in this state of affaires, being no lesse solicitous lest the Carthaginians should take the Castle then that themselves should loose it, subtilly attempting all means of victory, treated with Milo by Convenient Messengers, That if by his means they obtained Tarentus, they would suffer himself, with all his Men, safely to depart with bag and baggage. Milo, sending nothing at present more convenient for him, deals with the Tarentines; That joyning Counsels together they might deliberate on their Common safety: and at length perswades them, To send himself Embassadour to Papirius, diligently to conclude on Articles for all their Benefits. As they had willingly hereunto assented out of wearinesse of Cares and dangers: Milo accordingly, being gone to the Consul, with whom he had secretly contrived his Designe, brings back pretty faire conditions, and a most certain hope of making an agreement not to be repented of. The Credulous Tarentines hereupon with much security and confidence lay aside all care and Circumspection, giving Milo opportunity of delivering not only the Castle, but also the Citie it selfe up to the Romans. The Carthaginians no whit contented with this Event, neverthelesse pretending, Themselves friends to the Romans, and that the only cause of their coming was to Expel Milo, hoised sails and returned. Some Authors affirm that the Romans forwarned the Carthaginians, That if they intermeddled in the Tarentine affairs, they would make a breach of the League, and that they not only slighted this admonition, but sent Auxiliaries to stand in Battell against them; upon which account chiefly the War brake forth between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily; though the Carthaginians, willing to cover their fault by Perjury, took Oath, That they did nothing with evil or deceitful intent. As I will not deny but that some such passage might happen between the Generals, or that the people commonly discourse so, while the Romans brooked not the others presence, and the Carthaginian endeavoured to keep close their design; so I think there afterwards arose more probable causes of that War, in that it brake not out on the sudden. And that it was occasioned chiefly upon the Mamertines account, while the League was entire between the Romans and Carthaginians.

The Consuls returning home, were received with the joy and salutes of all, and triumphed in great Pompe, with much Goodwill of the People. In the mean time Q. Fabius Gurgus, and the others who were sent to Alexandria, relate in Senate the Result of their Embassage, That they were received and Entertained with all kind of Hospitality and Benevolence, that great and Magnificent gifts were sent to them at their first arrival, but much greater at their departure, that they thought it to become the Roman dignity and abstinence, modestly to refuse the first, that the other, which were by all means to be received, they had, before they did any other business, added to the publick Treasury; that at Alexandria, when being invited to publick feasts, they had Crowns of Gold sent them according to custom, they did for luck's sake receive them, but in the night time put them upon the King's Statues. The Senate wonderfully rejoicing, both at the Success of their Journey, and the Gravity of the Embassadors, giving them thanks, That they had by their Continence rendered the Roman Manners Venerable to Foreign Nations, commanded the gifts they had conveyed into the Treasury to be restored them. The people likewise decreed the like, saying, The Commonwealth would be excellently well managed if the base means of growing rich by Publick employments were taken away: And the Questors, according to command, willingly restoring the money, the Embassadors worthy of the reward of their Abstinence, did with as much credit receive the Egyptian gifts as they had refused them. Q. Fabius, who was prime man in the Embassy, was, I believe, in this consideration also preferred before so many Egregious men, and chosen Prince of the Senate by M. Curius and L. Papirius the Censors, being now, by reason of the Nobility of his Family, his Fathers Merits, two Consulships, and as many Triumphs, Inferior to none in Honour. The same men being Consuls, M. Curius the Censor was at cost, out of the enemies spoils, to bring the water of the River Anien to Rome: So much scorning to encrease his private wealth by them, that being on a time by some ill-willers taxed of having perverted the publick money, producing a piece of wood which he was wont to use in sacrifice, took Oath, That of all the enemies plunder, he never brought nothing else into his house. He was a man indeed of high deserts, as for the greatness of his Exploits, so for his many Illustrious examples in other Virtues; as we shall be by manifest, by relating some of his Actions and Sayings; For I count it not unworthy or unbecoming the Office of an Historian, to recount those things whereby those who are hereafter to undertake the management of publick affairs may be no lesse instructed to the attaining Felicity by Virtue, then by Military counsels and performances. In the Sabine War (when there was such plenty of spoils that Fabius the writer of the History, thinketh the Romans then to have had the first taste of Riches) Curius, claiming nothing of so rich a victory, but the conscience and fame of it, continued in his former poverty and hardinesse of life.

For when the Grounds of the Enemy were appropriated to the Common wealth, he distributed to every private Person but forty Acres by the Man: And the Senate allotting him a greater portion, he being contented with the same Measure he had meted to others, said, Ho

Was no good Citizen who would not be satisfied with as much as others were. This was afterward the Curian Cottage among the Sabines, where when the Samnites (being lately overcome) found him frying of Carrots, and presented him with a vast summe of Gold, I had rather, sayes he, eate these out of my Earthen platters, and rule over those who are rich in gold. Near this place Cato the Elder having a Farm, went often thither, and contemplating in his mind the poore Tenement and Little Ground, which so Eminent a Man after three Triumphs, tilled with his own hands, together with the Temperance and abstinence of his Life, did thereby provoke himself, out of the Emulation of his vertue, to the like Constancy and simplicity of Manners. And truly there needed such men to lay the foundations of a future Empire so firm, as it might bear the weight of the superstructure, and not only resist the storms of the Enemy from abroad, but scarcely and with much adoe be ruined by its own inbred Vices.

Polybius 1.7

THE most potent enemy of Rome being now after many battels vanquished, and peace settled throughout all Italy, The Senators entred into Consultation how to make a good use of their Victories. They concluded to fine all Nations who had borne Arms against them; the loss of part of their Territories, taking a more severe revenge of the Tarentines, by how much the more wantonly and intemperately they had offended; they were therefore commanded to resign up all their Arms and Ships, their Walls were demolished, a Tribute imposed upon the City, and nothing granted them but Peace and Liberty. There was now nothing of an old score more to be intended, then to punish the Treachery of that Legion, which circumventing the Rhegians by craft, had now for ten years possessed their City. They foreseeing that the Roman affairs proceeding so prosperously, their wickedness would not passe unrevenged, had very diligently taken care for whatsoever belonged to strengthening the City, and provided all things for their own defence, being very conscious that what is obtained by cunning and violence, cannot but by the same arts be maintained. Besides their own innate Fierceness, they much confided in the friendship of the Mamertines, and were puffed up with their success against the Carthaginians and Pyrrhus, whereby they had sufficiently made experiment of the strength of their City, and the courage of their own minds, having quickly repulsed the enemies from the siege. They sored therefore to such an height of Rebellion, that daring to take Croton, which was by some betrayed to them, they slew the Roman Garrison and demolished the City. Wherefore L. Genucius the Consul, who was that year Colleague with C. Quinctius, had commission to execute vengeance upon them, and the Rebels being confined within the Walls, the City was besieged. But while they strongly resisted with their own and the Mamertine forces, the Consul having sustained some incommodities, and become in want of necessary provisions, was assisted with Corn and men by Hiero, who was at that time Prince of Syracuse. For he, being offended with the Mamertines, did likewise hate their associates of Rhegium; he was likewise moved by the encrease of the Roman power, to preoblige them to future benefits, as occasion should serve.

The Citie being at length forced to yield, the Mamertines were by the Consul dismissed upon certaine Covenants, the Runaways and thieves, many whereof had fled thither as to a sanctuary, ry, were put to death: The Legionary souldiers were carried to Rome that the Senate might passe Judgement upon them. Herein was shewed a notable Example of publick severity, for the Senate decreed first, They should all be secured in prison, and afterward, be left to Execution: And when M. Fulvius Flaccus, Tribune of the People interceded for them, declaring, They ought not to take away the Lives of so many Citizens, contrary to the Laws and Customs of their Forefathers, The Senators persisting in their Resolution neglected the clamours of the Tribune, and Justice was accordingly executed upon the guilty. But lest by so severe an act they might contract an odium, and the sorrow of the vulgar people be aggravated if such a multitude should at one time be put to death, they did every day execute fifty, first scourging, then beheading them. Moreover it was ordered that neither their Bodies should be buried, nor any Mourning made for their Death. Decius Fabellius (who had lived unto that day, after the Loss of his sight, that he might die with the more griefe) took away his own life in prison. Following the greatest number of Authours I have reported the whole Legion, even foure thousand men, to have been beheaded in the Market-place at Rome; but I think it more probable what is related by Polybius, That but three hundred of that Legion came alive into the Romans power, that the rest, at the taking of the City, desperately fighting, chose rather to be slain, as well knowing that after such hainous villanies, nothing could be expected upon surrender, but more torments and a cruel ignominious death. The City of Rhegium with all its former Rights, Laws, and Liberties was restored to the ancient inhabitants, as many as could any where be found or enquired out.

This act of Justice did much increase the Reputation of the City of Rome, and thereby was gained no lesse Love from all the Italians and neighbouring People, then their armes had caused fear. In the Consulship of C. Genucius, and Cn. Cornelius there was war with the Sardinates, a people of Umbria, inhabiting the Apennine Mountains: By what reason provoked, or in what hopes trusting, they now opposed the Formidable power of the Romans (those writings which are remaining making no mention) I am not able to Divine; Likewise the whole Proceedings of the war are utterly lost, and of the memory of these things, nothing else is come to our knowledge, but that Cn. Cornelius Triumphed over the Sardinates. 'Tis reported there was a most sharp winter in these Consuls time, in so much that the Sap being chill'd Trees withered; That Tiber was covered over with deep Ice, and that the Cattell perished for want of Fodder; so great and vehement was the coldness of the air, that monstrous hills of snow lay unmelted in the Market place for forty dayes together. The thing being unusual in that Climat, and by many look'd upon as a Prodigie, perplexed mens minds with wonderful terror, their fear being not long after much encreased, when L. Ogulnius Gallus and C. Fabius Pittor being Consuls, many strange unheard of sights were seen, and many more reported. At Rome the Temple of Salus with part of the walls was smitten with thunder and lightning; three Wolves before day brought a carcase half eaten into the City, and being themselves feared by the noise of men, left it in the market-place torn into pieces limb from limb.

At Fo-mii the walls were said to be often struck and cast down with thunderbolts; and news was brought that in the Calenian fields, the earth opened, and fire suddenly brake out, which flaming for three whole daies together, burnt five acres of ground to ashes, insomuch that not only all the fruits on that place were blasted, but even the Trees died at the very Roots. These things caused more feare then misery at Rome; No great matter ensued, but that a War was made against the Picentians, which being the next yeare finished, added likewise that province to the Roman Jurisdiccions. Now in the Citie began the Coining silver, (their wealth being encreased by their victories) whereas before Brasse only was used in all Exchanges; but then pennies and half pennies were made of silver, which went for ten, and five pounds of brasse; there were likewise lesser pieces which being esteemed at two pound and an halfe of brasse, were from their value called, Sesterces. It was called, Moneta, because it was coined in the Temple of Juno, to whom that Name was given, by reason she did Movere, that is, admonish the Romans when in the War of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines they Consulted about their wants, That money would not be wanting to those, who observed Justice and prosecuted Wars. The Consuls C. Gallus and C. Fabius went forth to apprehend Lollius the Samnite, who having been Hostage at Rome had privily escaped, and now possessing a certain Castle, committed Plunder and Pillage round about, stirring up the minds of his Countrymen to Rebellion, when they were scarce well compos'd by the last peace.

But he with the forces he had gather'd (being for the most part unarmed) could not long resist: The greatest difficulty and danger was in the Province of the Carcines (a part of Samnium near the Frentanes) where the Romans assaulted a well fenced place, the Receptacle of Lollius his spoils, and from great hopes falling into as great fear, did at length obtain the Victory. Some of the Garrison upon condition of Pardon, let the Romans into the walls in a bright Moon-shiny night, and the Townsmen mustring themselves together upon the tumult, when they first began to fight a great drift of snow fell and took away their sight: This accident was a great help to the Carcines against the Romans, who were ignorant of the Passages, in so much that they were in very great danger, and now ready to give back and retreat (which in the dark could not have been done without much loss) when on a sudden the snow ceased and the Moon shone out again, and then being freed from blind fear, they did by their courage make way to

But the year following P. Sempronius Sophus, and Appius Claudius Crassus the son of Caius being Consuls undertook the War, and happily finished it. About these times was a Colony planted at Ariminum in the Picene grounds, which belonged to the Senones of Gallia, and another at Maleventum in Samnium, but changing the Name, which seemed Ominous, they called it Beneventum. The Sabines who were many years agoe admitted into the City, had now the liberty of Votes granted them. Claudius had also business in Umbria, where he took Camarinum and sold the inhabitants for slaves. But because the war seemed not very honestly to be managed by the General, the Romans preferring Justice before their own profit, decreed, That the Camertes should be sought out and redeemed, that they should be received into the City, have a place of habitation allotted to them in the Aventine Mount, and their ground restored to them.

Greater was the joy for the Picentine Victory, which was thought worthy to be Coined in their new Pieces of silver, that it might the more publicly be known, and the Memory thereof transmitted to Posterity. Q. Cadius the son of Quintus, by order of Senate, took care for coining the Money, representing on one side Picus the son of Saturne (for he is thought to be the Father of that Nation) on the other side a Roman Magistrate reaching forth his hand to a suppliant. And that, by subduing of that Country, a great access of strength was made to the Romans is Manifest, in that three hundred and threescore thousand Picentians subjected themselves unto them. For that War the Consuls, as they deserved, did Triumph, but Sempronius his Glory was the greater, in that with more dangers and hazzard he had fought against the stronger enemy; For a suddain Earthquake, being very prodigious, happened, as the battles were set in array now ready to encounter; But the Consul composed the souldiers feareful minds, by an oration very fit for the occasion, telling them, The enemy was no lesse troubled with unnecessary devotion then themselves, that theirs would be the Victory who first, shaking off fear, valiantly charged the enemy before he was well come to himself. And vowing a Temple to the Goddesse Tellus, if she would grant Victory to the Romans, he began the Charge, which was as Couragiously received and so great a slaughter made, that, 'tis reported, the lesser half remained even of the Victorious Army. After this fight (as other the Townes of the Picentians, so likewise) Asculum the Metropolis yielded it self to Sempronius, and by its example the whole Nation submitting it self in obedience, obtained peace of the Romans. All that part of Italy being now subdued, which lieth toward the Sicilian and Jonian sea, there remained onely the Sallentines to be brought in, who live upon the utmost coast where the upper and Ionians seas meet, to these therefore as by a Contagion did the war proceed from the Picentians; M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Julius Libo being Consuls: The quarrel was pretended because they had received Pyrrhus into their Havens and Towns when he came first out of Epirus. But indeed the much truer causes of the war were thought to be the Conveniency of the Haven of Brundisium, where ships may go in and out with the same wind, the easie passage from thence into Illyrium and Epirus, and that they esteemed it very opportune to have the same Bounds both of Italy and their own dominions. Both the Consuls triumphed for this war in one day, which was the eighth of the Calends of February.

Having overcome the Sallentines in a set battel, they took Brundisium, the most famous Town in those quarters; other successes also they had, being assisted, as is reported, by Pales the Goddess of Shepherds, who of her own accord, as a reward of the Victory, desired to have a Temple dedicated to her in Rome. The greater part of the Sallentines being vanquished by these, the war was finished and the victory completed by the next years Consuls, who were Numerius Fabius C. F. M. N. and D. Junius D. F. D. Nepos Pera: To these both the Umbrians and Sallentines yielded themselves. All Italy even between the River Adriatic and the seas being generally settled, the Roman greatness began to be famed and taken notice of by the neighbour Islands, and the Continent adjoining to the Jonian and Adriatic sea, causing in some hopes, in others fear.

For they who by violence and injury to their neighbours enlarged their own power, feared the Romans would prove an hindrance to their proceedings, the others contrarywise looking on them as a Succour, sent to them from heaven against the Oppression of their adversaries. The Apollonians were the first, who sending Embassadors to Rome craved their friendship; their Citie is seated threescore furlongs from the sea, being built by the Corinthians and Corcyraens, having a very commodious haven, where the neerest passage is from Brundisium into Greece. The Illyrians and Macedonians are adjacent to them, so that against strong and Covetous neighbours they had much adoe to preserve their own liberty. The message was wonderful welcome and with much Humanity received by the Romans, not so much for the wealth of the Citie which was but small, as for Future hopes in that they thought a way laid open and occasion given them of greater designs hereafter: Insomuch that very severe punishment was inflicted on certain noble young men who upon a quarrel arising had stricken the Embassadors. Q. Fabius was not protected either by the Dignity of his office, for he was then Edile or the greatness of his Extraction, but was delivered up to the Apollonians for his offence. Cn. Apronius who was likewise Edile, was given up for the same crime, the Senate decreed, they should by

He.

Heralds be delivered up into the hands of the Embassadors that a Quæstor should go along with them to Brundisium lest their friends and Kindred should rescue them by the way. This was a great testimonie as of their publick faith, so of their wisdom; For having a desire to draw forreign Nations into their friendship by the Reputation of their Justice, it much concerned them most precisly to punish the injuries done to those who first came to enter into their society. Neither would any thing have proved more destructive to their designs then that the Appollonians should have repented themselves of their act, and others of their example. And hence sprung that custom, which was constantly in after times observed, That they who had stricken the Embassadors of a free Citie should be delivered up to it. But the Appollonians, when they were brought into their Citie, wisely considering they should gaine more by Clemency and humanity then Revenge, sent them safe home again. This year each Consul triumphed twice; D. Junius the fifth of the Calends of October, Numerius Fabius the third of Nones of the same Month over the Sarsinates, a people of Umbria. Again they triumphed over the Sallentines and Messapians who had afflicted the Sallentines, Fabius on the Calends of February, Junius on the Nones. And this was the Conclusion of all their Italian Wars; For what was acted in Volunia next year, Quintus Fabius Gurges the third time Consul, L. Mamilius Visulus being his Colleague, was not so much a war against a just enemy, as vengeance inflicted upon slaves in behalf of their associates.

The Volunians, the richest people of all Etruria, did implore the Romans assistance against those who were formerly their servants. For by very ill and foolish advice (whether it were, that thereby they thought to increase their strength so much broken in the late wars, or that themselves tumbling in delights were loath to trouble themselves with the labour of Arms) they made their servants free of the City, and committed the Militia into their hands. Afterward they began to be chosen Senators, and to bear Offices of State. In short time oppressing the old Citizens, and usurping the whole power of the Commonwealth to themselves, they did most insolently exercise their Liberty against their Masters who gave it them. It was now grown common to Ravish Virgins and honest Matrons by force, to heap Contumelies and Indignities upon Parents and Husbands, crying for justice according to Law; and all things were confusedly hurried according to the pleasure of the vilest most petulant Knaves. And that we may not pass over in silence a rare Precedent, to what issue the beastly impudence of slavish minds will proceed to when it hath gotten power, they made a Law, That the Libertines might have licence of Copulation with the wives and daughters of their Patrons, and that the Maidenhead of a Virgin designed in marriage to a true Freeman, should first be prostituted to one of their Order. Wherefore the old Volunians being neither able any longer to endure these miseries, nor by their own power to repulse and avoid them, secretly consulting together, resolved to send Embassadors to Rome. They having by private sollicitations prevailed that the Senate would meet in some private house (for they saw unavoidable ruine over their heads if the business was known) they did by a very sorrowful discourse make them acquainted with their sad condition, wherewith the Fathers being moved to compassion, promised them assistance for the recovery of their lost Rights.

But these things which were thought to be agitated in secret, were by a Samnite discovered to the parties complained of; For he, a guest to the master of the house where the Senate met, being then sick, was by forgetfulness left in a place where he overheard all their discourse and betrayed it. Therefore the Embassadors, after their Return from Rome, were called into question, and the whole business being found out, were with other prime Men of the Citie cruelly put to death. The Romans, now having a juster cause of War, sent Q. Fabius the Consul with an Army against them, whom, daring to encounter him in open field he put to flight, and slew a very great Number in the Pursuit: The Rest who betooke themselves into their place of defence, he resolved with counterworkes to besiege. But they making strong Resistance, The Consul (as there were frequent Pickerings and light skirmishes) unwarily venturing too far in the fight, received a wound whereof he dyed, which the besieged understanding, made a Sally with the greatest strength they could, hoping if they suddenly assaulted the enemy now in trouble for the loss of the Consul, to force them to break up the siege. But the event of the battel was contrary, for being roughly received by the Romans, they were beaten in again with losse.

In this fight I suppose Decius Mus to have had the Command; for he might happily have been Fabius his Lieutenant, and after his death be chief in managing the War till a successor was sent. And hence I conjecture it comes to passe that some negligent Historians have ascribed to Decius Mus both the beginning and finishing of this War. Cn. Cornelius L. P. Cn. N. Blasio and C. Marcius were created Censors that year, and this last having before born the same Office, was from this his Magistracy called Censorinus. The moderation of this Marcius was very remarkable, who being invested with Power which he sought not after, assembled the people together, and in a grave speech chid them, That they had twice intrusted that Office to the same man, whereas their forefathers did in this very consideration limit the time of it, because the power was too Great. Hereupon a Law was made, That the same man should not be made Censor the second time. The same year the number of the Quæstors was increased; in former times there were but four, two for the City, and two to assist the Consuls abroad in the Wars. But afterward their Taxes and Customs encreasing with the Commonwealth, there was a necessity of doubling the number. Appius Claudius who in the time of his Magistracy was surnamed Caudex, and M. Fulvius were Consuls the year ensuing, which was very memorable, in that then first began the war between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily. Then first brake out Hostility between two most potent Cities, which after many years, after many bloody overthrowes given and received, could not at length be ended without the utter ruine and destruction of one of them.

But, before we enter upon the History of the War, it will be necessary to relate something of former times concerning Carthage; for in the ensuing Narrative many things will occur, hard to be understood and judged of, unless both the Original and encrease of that City be first known.

B O O K V I.

DHAT Carthage was built by the Tyrians of Phenicia (besides the constant agreement of old Histories) the perpetual friendship of those Cities while they flourished, as also the manifest likeness both of their Language and Manners doth clearly testify. 'Tis reported that Elisa (who was likewise called Dido) the daughter of Agenor, the son of Belus, flying out of her Country (by reason of the hatred she bore to her brother Pigmalion for the unjust slaughter of her husband Sicharus) entred that Creek of Africa, and possessed that Peninsula where Carthage was afterward built; her small beginnings promising little hopes of so great power and wealth as afterwards was obtained. For 'tis believed Dido purchased no more ground then might be compassed with the hide of a Bull or Ox, which being cut out into very slender thongs contained a larger space, then the sellers did imagine, and it was sufficient whereon to Erect a Castle, which from thence is thought to be called Byrsa. Afterward seeing (many placing their habitation near them for Traffick sake) they began to look like a City, and that the Africans were willing to entertain among them men so rich and very gentle and quiet, they hearkned to the counsel sent from Utica (which was also a Colony of the Tyrians) which advised them, After their example to build a City. So it was agreed, That the Africans should afford them ground, and that the Phanicians in recompense thereof should pay a yearly Tribute.

The work being finished, Dido gave it a name in her own Language, Carthadas, the Greeks called it Carchedo, and the Romans by an error in Pronunciation, Carthago. This City having Loving Neighbours, an Industrious people, and what was above all, a Wife Queen, did in a short time wonderfully increase. These things seeme to have been acted some seventy years before the foundation of Rome; for about so ancient a Circumstance Authors do not very well agree. But as Elisa her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable. Parbas a Petit King of some African Province, sought to marry her, threatening upon refusal to raise war against her. But as she was averse from marriage by reason of her singular Chastity and love of her former husband, so she very well understood that in these tender beginnings of affairs, a war would prove fatal and destructive; therefore taking time to deliberate, as if she had at length overcome her own Resolution, and were inclined to marry the African, caused a

Iustinus

Pile of wood to be erected before her intended marriage, whereto sacrifice to the Infernal gods in behalf of her husband Sichæus. And after many Sacrifices offer'd, she did at length ascend the Pile, and killed her self with a sword she brought with her; her love to her Husband and Subjects exceeding the care of her own health. The Carthaginians returned her what honour they could, and while the Commonwealth flourished, worshipped her as a Goddess; raising a Temple in the place where she lived, calling her Dido, which in their language signifieth a Virago.

When after her death no man was thought worthy to succeed her in the Kingdom, the Citie began to be governed by the Mixed Power of Nobles and Commons. The Name of Kings still remained, but they were like the Lacedæmonian Kings; but that the honour was not to any Certaine families annexed, but conferred on any Prime Man who exceeded others in Virtue and Riches. These had the management of Wars abroad (wherefore the Romans called them Pretours and Dictatours, comparing their power with the usuage of their own Commonwealth) at home they were Princes of all publick Consultations, with their advice the affaires of the Citie were ordered: Things of heigher concernement were referred to the people, their sentence decided all controversie between the Kings and Senatours: They also had authority to alter the Laws made by the Kings and Councel, if they seemed contrary to the good of the Publick, which any man had Liberty to question. Which too great power of the Commons, being augmented to an intolerable height, by flattering Parasites and Orators, did in after time infinitely wrong and obstruct the Carthaginian affaires: Moreover in the Senate there were thirty of the more Antient appointed as a supreme Councel, and these had greatest authority with all Men. There was like wise a Superinspector of Manners, invetled with the same power as the Roman Censors, to maintain publick Decency and Discipline. In proceffe of time, after many victories, their greatnesse being encreased, they chose a greater Number of Commanders for the War: Among which Mago, the most Egregious both in courage and fortune, having left behind him two sonnes well educated and instructed in the art of Warre, and they also to their more numerous offspring, as it were by hand, delivering the same skill and knowledge, it was thought fit by some meanes to curbe the too great power of that Family; to this purpose an hundred men were constituted to passe sentence upon the Generals themselves: Their power was very formidable, as for the largenesse of their Commission, so for the continuance, which was during life, whereas even the Kings now, were not for so long a time but yearly created, whom at home they commonly called Suffetes, that is to say, Judges, much like to the Roman Consul. But when the Cenimviri or hundred men behaved themselves with much insolence, Hannibal by a Law reduced them into Order, it being decreed, That the Judges should Yearly be chosen, and that no man should continue in office two yeares together. Their gods and holy Rites they brought most from Tyrus, some they did afterwards add. Juno they chiefly adored, and Asculapins not a little, in whose honour they erected a Magnificent Temple in the Citie; Apollo's house was likewise very rich, covered with plate of Gold, wherein was a famous statue which after the Ruine of Carthage was carried to Rome and placed in the great Shew-place called Circus Maximus. But to Hercules at Tyrus they every year sent a ship, with great care well trimmed, with the Tithes of their yearly fruits, and spoiles gotten in War.

From the same Founders also they derived another most horrid Rite, to offer an humane sacrifice once a year to Saturnus, whom they called Belus, the Relicks of which Barbarous Cruelty could not be quite abolished by the Destruction of the Citie. The other Manners and Customes of the Citie were more civilized by their conveniency of Commerce and Traffick, to which being by nature, and Education from their Forefathers much addicted, they did apply all their studies and Counsels. Hence by an unavoidable mischief the Love of Riches corrupted their Courts of Justice, made Vertue a servant to money, inflamed the Peoples minds with Covetousnesse, and infected them with a sordid custom of Cheating and Lying, forcing the Commonwealth wholly to give it self up to these arts. Inasmuch as it came to passe that as little Faith was had in Carthaginian Contracts and Covenants, so the chiefest part of the publick strength consisted in ships, their Infantry the main support and pillar of all Empires, was had in no Request. Their Horse in very little: As often as they waged War by Land, they made use of Mercenaries, who had no true Love to the Commonwealth, whose faith was to be bought with money, their discord troublesome and their conspiracies pernicious. Which error was so Capital, that before the utter destruction of the City, no other enemy but those did ever bring them so near to final ruine.

Neither did a lesser crop of misery spring from this, That their Magistrates and Publick Officers did by mutual connivance exercise Extortion and Purloin the state without punishment; so that 'tis the lesse to be wondered, that a war arising between these two Cities, the Romans proved conquerors: when as the Senators in all hard times added their wealth to the publick stock, and the Carthaginians made a gain of the Commonwealth. But these vices grew up together with the City, so that at first being weak and little they were pretty well born withal, afterward for a while the greatness of their Empire, and the singular virtue of their Commanders made them the lesse sensible, by whose means chiefly, I find, was both obtained and established the happiness that ever attended Carthage. Their first beginning in Arms was against the Affricans, requiring Tribute for the ground the City was built on; neither could they extort that right out of their hands but by many battels: hereby they enlarged their Empire, and the best planted part of Africa was reduced into subjection to them. Their command of the seas gave them fair opportunity of passing over into Sardinia and Sicily; the one was rude and Barbarous, not able to resist, into the other they were invited by its Beauty and Fertility, which was, by reason of the Inhabitants perpetual discords exposed to the injuries of the most Potent. Out of Sardinia into Corfica their passage was short, and they did the more easily possess the Island as being not very rich.

But in Sicily for a long time they fought with various Fortune, obtaining many victories, and receiving many overthrows: Amilcar the son of Hanno when he had carried over three hundred thousand men, was vanquished by Gelo and slain. With which calamity being terrified, the Carthaginians did abstain from Sicily, till being called over by the Egestians, who were oppressed by the Selinuncians, they sent thither Annibal the son of Geseq the son of Amilcar; he destroying Selinuncs and Himera, did again encrease the Carthaginians power in Sicily. Imilco did at sea vanquish Leptis the brother of Dionysius the elder, and the Sicilians Admiral, he took and sunk an hundred ships, and slew above twenty thousand men, he surprised many Cities, and took also part of Syracuse, but a sudden Pestilence arising, which consumed most part of his Army, forced him to return home with very few men. Neither did they yet despair of gaining Sicily, but in few years after sent out Hanno with a fleet, commanding him to fight Dionysius. Afterward Mago being invited by Ictus, when he was in the City of Syracuse it self with threecore thousand foot, he was cast out by Timoleon; afterward the same Timoleon in a very great battel overcame Annibal and Amilcar, having in their army seventy thousand men, and forced their Camps likewise. But they had not a quicker and greater turne of fortune in any war then in that against Agathocles, who being beaten in Sicily, besieged in Syracuse, having no manifest hopes of safety, did yet of his own accord carry the war over into Africa, where having overcome the Carthaginians in many battels, and caused the Libyans every where to revolt, he brought them into very great danger and fear; and returning home again he expelled them clearly out of Sicily; till at length the death of the King, and the confusions which followed upon it, again gave them hopes, and opened them a way to regain possession. After this (as we have said) they variously fought with Pyrrhus, proving at length, to be the superiours.

In the mean time some Cities also in Spain became Tributary to them, whether being called to the assistance of the Gaditanes against some oppressing Neighbours, they sent relief to their Kinsmen (for Gades likewise was founded by the Tyrians) and reduced some adjacent Regions of Spain into their own Jurisdiction. This was the posture the Carthaginian affairs were in when they took up arms against the Romans. But the Syracusans and their King Hiero possessed the greater part of Sicily which was not subdued by the Carthaginians; the residue was held by the Mamertines. They while they were in League with the Roman Legion at Rhegium, and could have assistance from them, were not content to secure their own Territories, but invaded those of the Syracusans and Carthaginians, forcing many Cities to pay Tribute to them to avoid plunder, wastings of their grounds, and other incommodities of war. But when Rhegium was taken, and their companions worthily executed, being bereaved of that help, they were not able to uphold their former greatnesse; and having lost whatsoever they held out of Messana, were now at war with Hiero for the City it self. Concerning which King Hiero, I think it not inconvenient somewhat at large to discourse, because he in these times being first an enemy to the Romans, afterward for many years a companion and friend, was of very great moment in the settling of affairs. For in him was found singular happiness, great virtue, and most eminent wisdom; and in those dayes the power and state of Syracuse did with him flourish and with him fall.

This man not being helped forward by any wealth or glory left by his Ancestors, owed all his fortune to himself, promoted from a low estate to vast power, not so many, by accepting great men, or by the slaughter and banishment of his opposers, but by wonderful modesty both in attaining and in exercising his power, as well knowing there is no Kingdom so well and firmly established, as that which is in such a manner order'd, that it more concerns the Subjects to fear the loss of it then the Prince.

Having reigned therefore four and fifty years, in such a time when two most potent Cities on each hand did with most sharp contentions, fight for the dominion of the world, troubled with no War abroad (unlesse in his first year) nor assaulted by any Treason at home, he died being above ninety years old, his senses being at that age entire and his body sound, as a certain argument of his Temperance, being not only beloved by his own people, but had in great Estimation both with the Romans and Grecians; when he would often have divested himself of the Principality, the Citizens did openly prohibite him; And his son Gelon, who, at above fifty years of age, died before him, did all his life time, even to the last, with constant faith and obedience honour him, shewing a rare example of Moderation, in that he chose rather for ever to want a Kingdom then lose his Father. This Hiero was by his Father Hierocles (who derived his Pedigree from Gelon an ancient Tyrant of Sicily) exposed to the mercy of the world; forasmuch as he being a Noble man was shamed to bring up a child which he had begotten on a servant. But being destitute of all human succour, the Bees for many days fed him, putting honey into his mouth as he lay upon the ground, Hierocles being much affected with this Prodigie, and the answers of the Southsayers, who affirmed, That hereby Kingly power was prefignified signified, took home the Infant, acknowledged it for his own, and in hopes of his future greatness took diligent care for his Education. As he was learning his book among his equals, 'tis reported, that a Wolf suddenly appearing in the midst of the boyes took his book out of his hand. When he first entred into the Wars, 'tis said, An Eagle pitch'd upon his shield, and an Owle upon his speare; which was thought a signe of wisdom and strength; and by reason of the Kingly bird, of highest honour and dignity. But he himself shortly gave more certaine evidence, being of exceeding comelineffe and strength of body, but much more illustrious and beloved for his wit, Temperance, Gentlenesse, Justice and Moderation; having often fought single Combates sometimes in the Battel, sometimes against private Challengers, he was alwayes Victour, and by Pyrrhus frequently rewarded with many Military Gifts for his valour; and Pyrrhus his Kinswoman Nereis was afterward married to Gelon the son of Hiero. Pyrrhus being driven out of Sicily, when (according to the ill temper of those times) a dissension arose between the army and Citie of Syracuse, Artemidorus and Hiero were, in the Camp near Mergana, by suffrage of the souldiers chosen Commanders. By the advice of Hiero, and the help of his friends, some souldiers being privily sent into the Citie reduced it into their Power; where Hiero shewed himself a gallant Man, and fit for the government of any Realme whatsoever; For, of the several factions which weretherein, he neither slew nor banished any one Man, but by his clemencie, Moderation and upright Counsel so compounded their differences, that he was chosen Pretor of Syracuse with the good will and affection even of those against whom he came, as much as of those men who invited him thither. He with his whole heart as sincerely tending the publick good as his own (having observed an ill Custome of a long standing in Sicily, That the General could no sooner lead his forces out of the City but there was either some sedition raised in the Army, or some innovation made at home) began to consult with himself, In whose hands to entrust the City when he should be forced to go out to War. He married therefore the daughter of Leptis, who was very popular, of great authority among the Citizens, of eminent honesty and faithful to his trust.

Having thus provided for Domestick affairs, he devised a remedy (very necessary indeed; but not altogether praise-worthy) against the insolency of the mercenary souldiers: For drawing out his army against the Mamertines when they met him near Centuripa, he order'd his battel near the River of the Cyanosiani with such art, that he left a good distance between the Citizens and the Mercenaries, then commanding the Mercenaries to begin the fight, as if he and the City forces would on some other side Charge the enemy while they were already buied. The Mercenaries by this means being furrounded by the greater number of Mamertines, were slain; himself (having thus employed the enemy) marched fair and softly with his other forces to Syracuse.

Having in this manner purged the Army of those who were ill disposed and enclined to sedition; he diligently Traineth his City forces; hireth new Auxiliaries, and now having the goodwill of all (the most insolent being removed and the rest not daring to murmur) he order'd the Government according to his own pleasure. In the mean while, the Mamertines proud of their late victory and grown more fierce, rashly, and without fear invaded and spoiled the Syracusan Territories. Hiero now confiding both in the City and Army, forthwith marcheth out against them, and pitcheth his Camp near the enemies City, almost empty by reason of having sent out every way so many Troops. The Mamertines understanding the danger, suddenly return home to the relief of their City, with all their forces joyned. Hiero removing his Camp out of the Mamertine Fields, taketh the City of Mila, and in it fifteen hundred souldiers; thence gaining by the way some Castles, he marcheth to Amaselum (which is seated in the midst between Agrinum and Centuripa) which (though it were well fenced, and protected by a strong Garrison) he forced and demolished. The souldiers he received into pay, and caused to fight under him; the grounds he divided between the Centuripines and Agrines. Being animated with this success, he again invaded the Mamertine Territories, taketh Alisum upon composition; but the Abacenines and Tyndarites voluntarily surrender themselves to him. Hereby were the Cities on each hand next to Messana on both the coasts subject to Hiero, (for the Tindaritan inhabit toward the Etrurian Sea, the Tauromenians, who were at this time in friendship with the Syracusans, toward the Sicilian Sea.) The Mamertines therefore being streightned, send out their forces under the conduct of Cio their Pretor to oppose the enemy, who now was lodged near the River Longanus in the Mylean fields. The battel being begun, and the fight along time doubtful, Hiero suddenly sending in fresh Troops upon the Flank of the Mamertines, made the Victory his own. For before the fight Hiero had placed together two hundred Messanian Exuls, valiant men, who hated the Mamertines, with four hundred choice men of his own Army, commanding them, To go about the hill Thorax, and by a sudden incursion to fall upon the enemy on the other side, which they stoutly performing were the cause why the whole Mamertine Army fell by the sword.

Cio, seeing all lost, and desiring nothing more then to dye, was taken prisoner, fore wounded, and conveyed into the Syracusan campe: finding the Prediction of the Entrails and Southsayers true in another sense then he expected. For before the Battel the Prophets looking into the Intestines of the sacrifice promised, He should lie in the Enemies Camp that night: Which he esteeming an argument of victory too late found himself deluded by another

Interpretation, with grief and sickness cast down, when the next day among other horses, he espied that his son rode upon in the Field, conjecturing thereby his death, he resolutely pulling the cloaths and plaisters off his wounds made way to his own death. The Mamertines, understanding their overthrow, grew full of despair, and were now ready to present their humble supplication to the Conquerours, when an unexpected accident prevented them. It happened that at the same time Hannibal, the Carthaginian Pretor, was in the Liparan Islands, which are adjacent to Sicily. He having intelligence of Hiero's Victory, fearing lest (the Mamertines being utterly vanquished) the Syracusan power would grow too great for the Carthaginians, came suddenly oyer under pretence of congratulating with Hiero for his Victory; and hindring him from directly marching to Messana, did himself make first entrance, and when the Mamertines were now ready to yield, did not only possess them with hopes of retaining their liberty, but left a strong Garrison of his own souldiers amongst them. Hiero understanding himself by this craft deluded, & being not sufficiently prepared for a siege, made now more difficult, returned to Syracuse, where being received by all with very great joy, he was by an universal acclamation saluted King, which Title he afterward retained with the consent both of the Citizens and others of the Island without.

When Hiero was retreated, the Mamertines having a little space of resuming confidence, began to deliberate upon their present condition, but were divided into two Factions, some thought it not to be disputed, 'But that they should commit themselves to the protection of the Carthaginians, which as for many other reasons it was convenient, so having admitted their Garrison, 'twas little lesse then necessary. On the other side 'twas said, 'The Carthaginians were no lesse enemies to the Mamertines then Hiero, that without doubt their purpose of sending of the City was not out of good will, but desire of Dominion; That of a long time they had aspired to the Empire of Sicily, neither were cast down from their bold hopes by losse of Armies and Navies, no not by wars in Africa, and fear of their own state at home; That therefore without exception they must prove Vassals if they commit themselves to those who have so strong a Navy, and possess greatest part of Sicily it self. That 'tis therefore no way expedient to desire aid from the Carthaginians, a covetous, unfaithful people, who will lay heavier burdens upon them then they could fear from the Syracusans. If the Punick Garrison came only with intent to preserve the City from Hiero, they may now upon fair terms be dismissed having done the work: But if they have some other clandestine design, it behooveth them with the greater care to prevent the danger of their deceitful friendship. That they should rather implore assistance from the Romans, as a people invincible, of unquestionable faith and sincerity, who will have neither occasion nor opportunity of keeping Messana under their jurisdiction, as having not a foot of ground in Sicily, nor any use of sea affairs, and consequently taking no care therein. That they would be abundantly content to keep Italy secure from Hiero and the Carthaginians, having made Messana strong as an obstacle to their further proceedings. That therefore they should continue to rely upon the Roman faith rather then any other Nation; that indeed they could neither with honesty or any convenience change their former counsels, having already sent Embassadors and obtained hope of succour and relief. For the Mamertines before their last battel with Hiero, beginning then to distrust in their own strength had craved assistance of the Romans as their Kinsmen. And the people being perswaded by the Consuls who were desirous of employment in the Wars, had decreed that aid should be sent to them; but the Senate out of shame to be counted authors of the business, did defer it. For they who had lately so severely punished their own Legion for the wicked surprize of Rhegium, if they should now assist the Mamertines, who had by the like treachery obtained the mastery of Messana, they saw they should clearly loose the reputation of their Justice and Fidelity, which by their former act they had acquired. But now having heard of the Mamertines overthrow, and not doubting but if they were forsaken by the Romans, they would apply themselves to the Carthaginians, with one consent they ordained to send them relief. For in the Senate many had before inclined to this opinion, as foreseeing that otherwise Messana quickly, and not long after all Sicily would come under the Carthaginian power, which if it were once come to passe, they should be forced to fight with the Carthaginians for their own possessions in Italy.

For this danger would prove unavoidable, as well by reason of the insatiable desire of Rule in those who are potent, as by the convenient scituation of the places. For Italy, proceeding in a long tract between the two seas from the Ligurians and Venetians, to the Brutians, is there divided from Sicily by a very narrow Channel. For there is no doubt made but that these Regions in old times were a continent, afterward divided by the sea, whether the grounds being low were easily overflown, or whether some earthquake or strength of the Tides cut off the Isthmos. From hence many think that Town to be called Rhegium, because things which are broken, are by some such word nominated in the Greek Tongue. 'Tis therefore very credible that the first inhabitants of Sicily came out of Italy, as may be conjectured by the very name. For the Opici are said to have built a Citie on the adverse shore over against Italy, which because it was scituate in a Creek of the sea bearing the figure of a Sythe, they called it, I beleeve, Sicilia, which the Grecians afterward coming, called Zancla, both those words in the several Languages signifying a Sythe. From thence, as often it happens, the name was derived to the whole Island, Which was by many called both Zancla and Sicilia.

This

This Island far excelleth all others in the Mediterranean Sea, both in extent of ground, and fruitfulness of Soile, yeelding abundance of Oyl and Wine and Corn of the best; adorned with many, and those very great Cities, even to wonder; and if you consider the Commodity of the Havens, and situation of the whole Island, there is scarce to be found in the world a place more fit for the chiefe seat of an Empire: For, being near adjacent to Italy, on the contrary part it looketh toward Africa, on another side lyeth Sardinia, and on east it hath Peloponnesus devided from Gracia by the Ionian sea: On every hand the voyage is short, and the passage easy for ships whether bound outward or homeward. And truly, though other reasons were alledged, yet the only cause of the War between the Carthaginians and Romans, was, without doubt, the great desire each of them had to be Masters of this Island. The Romans found fault, That the Carthaginians contrary to the League had assisted the Tarentines; the Carthaginians on the other side charged them, for having entred into Confederacy with Hiero against them. But to so great a power were now both these Cities advanced, that it could not be avoided, but that at some time or other for some cause they must needs find occasion to fall out. For as Trees planted at no great distance, for a while do not much hinder one the other, but being grown to some bignesse bereave one the other of Juice and nourishment from the earth, and at full growth enterwinding both root and branches mutually destroy one the other: So rising Empires cannot long be at Amity and friendship, but, swallowing up what is interjacent between each others Dominions, desire to try the superiority between themselves, neither being able to put a limit to their own ambition or to enlarge their Territories without removing all Opponents.

To these causes may be added the great power the Comminalty had in each City, together with their earnest desire of undertaking the War. In Carthage the vulgar sort did much prevail, and now in the encrease of their City, growing rich by many Commodities, were willing for gains sake to have war upon war. The condition of the Roman people was not much different, for having in the former wars sustained damage in their estates, they hoped by the riches of Sicily to recompence themselves, and therefore, according to that power they had lately extorted from the Senate, did approve and confirm their sentence who perswaded the war. Hereby Appius the Consul being commissioned (whereas otherwise the major part of the Senate had assented, overpowering the votes of those who stood to old Rules) without delay sendeth Claudius a Tribune of souldiers beforehand with some few ships, to observe an opportunity, and if any were offered, to waite over into Sicily. When he was come to Rhegium, not daring to hazard his ships because he saw the seas obstructed with a greater fleet of Carthaginians, he entred into a Fishermans vessel and crossed over to Messana; there discomfing with the Mamertines as the present occasion required, being not able to overcome the contradiction of the Carthaginians, he returned without having done his business. But awhile after understanding there was a dissention at Messana, some pleading against the Roman assistance, the greater part bearing ill will to the Carthaginian Garrison, he again crossed the sea, and among other things to the present purpose told them, His coming was only to set the City at liberty, which when he had effected he would immediately return. The Carthaginians answer'd, The Romans need not trouble themselves for the liberty of a City which was under their jurisdiction, the Carthaginians had already out of their good will taken care that the Mamertines should not be compelled to be subject to the Syracusans: That therefore he might depart, or else give some other reason of his being at Messana. Claudius denied, The City was free so long as a Foreign Garrison continued therein contrary to their pleasure.

To this when no man returned any answer, the Carthaginians out of pride, the Mamertines for fear holding their peace, he cunningly and readily proceeded, 'Tis plaine, saith he, by this your general silence, that the Carthaginians cause is unjust, and that the Mamertines are desirous of liberty, otherwise neither would the one forbear to justifie their own Right, and the others, if they consented with the Carthaginians, having no cause to dissemble, would freely and openly speak their minds. At this there arising a kind of a noise in the assembly, many praising his speech as true, and indeed agreeing with their inward thoughts; he (thinking he had, for the present, sufficiently moved the Mamertines and tryed the disposition of their minds) went back to Rhegium. And not long after, having made ready his ships, he attempted to passe over; but being much inferiour to the Carthaginian Commanders, both in number of vessels, and skill in sea affairs, and being beaten back by the violence of the Waves, in a sudden storme arising, he returned to his port, having lost some ships, and hardly saving the Rest. But being nothing terrified with this misadventure, he new trioned his ships, resolving upon a better opportunity once more to make tryal of Fortune: When behold messengers came from Hanno (Governour of the Mamertine Garrison, and Guardian of the seas) bringing with them all the ships and men which the Carthaginians had taken in the former fray: Hanno's design herein was to cast the blame of the breach of Covenants upon the Romans, he therefore also complained, That they had by force attempted to sail in those seas which were in the possession of the Carthaginians; and furthermore perswaded them to have a great care of preserving peace and maintaining the league.

But hearing that Claudius would not admit of any conditions unlesse they would withdraw their forces out of Messana, and that again he endeavoured to cross the sea, he vaunted, That he would not suffer the Romans so much as to wash their hands in that sea. Nevertheless he could not

- not prevent Claudius, who observing the Nature of the sea, laid hold of an opportunity when the wind happily helped the Tide, and arrived in Sicily without opposition. There calling a Counsel of those Mamertines he found in the Haven, he persuaded them, 'To call Hanno to them, as if they had some business at present to consult with him about. For Hanno, not much confiding in the Townsmens doubtful minds, had with the souldiers possessed the Castle, neither was he willing to trust himself in any of their Assemblies: Yet fearing if he betrayed his Diffidence, he might encrease their complaints, and by his absence give them occasion to joyn with the Romans, he came to discourse with them, where the time being spun out with disputation and wrangling, the Romans, with the Mamertines their approbation, laid hands on him and cast him into prison. So being circumvented by craft, and frightened with menaces, when no other condition would be accepted, he was compelled to restore the Mamertines their Castle, and draw away his Garrison. The Carthaginians upon intelligence of the business, were above measure exasperated, and (whereas otherwise they used to punish their Commanders for evil counsels though they prospered) exclaiming both against the folly and cowardize of Hanno, miserably crucified him, and immediately sent both sea and land forces to Messana with another Hanno, the son of Hannibal, to order affairs in Sicily: He drawing his forces together at Lybæum, marched to Selinus, where pitching his Camp, he left his foot army and went to Agigentum, and (having fenced the Castle there) he drew the people, being friends to the Carthaginians, into arms against the Romans: From whence being returned to his Camp, Embsadours came to him from Hiero, who being no whit content with the Romans arrival into Sicily, thought this the fittest season wherein joyning forces for a time with the Carthaginians, both they and also the Barbarians in possession of Messana might be driven out of Sicily. Having therefore had discourse with the Carthaginian General, they easily agreed to enter into confederacy against the Romans, who had supplanted both to their equal losse, each of them having failed of their hopes of Messana: 'twas ordered they should jointly besiege Messana, and suffer no part of Sicily to be subject to any power but the Carthaginians or Syracusans. So the Carthaginian Commander with his whole strength moved against the Mamertines, having first sent an Herald to charge the Romans, 'If they would be esteemed friends of the Carthaginians to depart Messana, and within a time prefixed to quit Sicily. The ships were commanded to keep their station about Pelorus, the foot army fortified their Camp at a place not far from Messana, called Cubilla, in the Greek tongue Euyal. Hiero likewise, according to agreement, came with his Syracusan Army, and laid siege to the Citie on the other side, about the Hill Chalcidica, so the Citie, being round besirt, could not safely receive succour either by land or sea.
- About the same time, when the Herald brought back no peaceful answer from Messana, the Carthaginians, partly out of anger, partly out of distrust, cruelly put to death all their Mercenary souldiers which were Italians by Nation. These things were no sooner heard at Rome, but the Consul Appian was forthwith sent with a strong Army to Rhegium, thence he sent some before, to treat with the Carthaginians and Hiero about breaking up the siege, in the mean time, seeing the seas so strongly guarded, he was very solicitous and intent in contriving how to cross over with the least danger. The Consul's Embassadors brought back no friendly answer from the Carthaginians, but were by Hiero with an accurate oration sharply reprehended, he first having recounted the many good offices he had done the Romans, proceed saying, 'I am in doubt, Romans, whether I should grieve for my self or for you; I indeed have lost friends of you somewhat worse then I took you to be, but ye have lost that Reputation of Justice and Integrity for which ye were so famous among all Nations. With the Mamertines ye never had any friendship or society, ye had heretofore League with the Carthaginians, and lately entred into one with Me. Being now willing to breake these Leagues, can ye give an account, by what injury from us, or merit of the Mamertines ye are thereunto provoked? But because the Carthaginians are able to speake for themselves, omitting what concerneth them, I shall at present put you in mind of things in reference to my self alone. The Mamertines your good Country men, did, as you know, receive pay under the Syracusan Banners, and being dismissed for their Returne for Italy, after they had been entertained as friends and Companions by the poore credulous Messenians, committed a most horrid fact, as hath not been remembered by man, slaying in the night time their Land-lords, and keeping in their own power, their goods, wives, children and the Citie it self. Which unlesse your selves (being of the same opinion with other men) had judged to be a most vile and execrable villany, you would not so severely have punished the self same fact of the Campanians committed upon the Rhegians, by the Mamertines Example. By the same indignitie therefore wherewith ye were moved to take revenge of wicked villanies, by the same am I moved not to let the Mamertines go unpunished, especially seeing they have since committed so many Robberies almost all Sicily over, burying as it were the memory of their first offence with others afterward committed. For (to omit other things) in that they destroyed the Cities of Camarina and Gela, then under the Syracusan protection, is reason sufficient why I should with a Just and pious War prosecute the boldnesse of such most impudent Men. If ye therefore undertake to defend them because, being born in the same Italy, they are as it were your kinsmen, how much more justly might you have spared the Rhegians which were your fellow-Citizens? When in the taking of Rhegium I helped you with Auxiliaries and Provisions, how should I possibly then Divine that ye would hereafter hinder * hinder me when I should upon as just causes besiege Messana? But what need I use many words? if you have any care left of your reputation and faithfulness, if any sense of honesty, at least if any shame, I ought not to doubt but that you will with your forces rather assist me in my just cause then oppose me. But if the consideration of these things seem light unto you, however the event of war be doubtful, 'tis most certain all the world will plainly understand, That the Romans were incited to bare arms against us, not out of any colour of Justice and Equity, not by any injuries received (for that ye can no way pretend) not out of any pity or good will to the Mamertines, but merely by their own ambition, and inordinate desire of adding this Noble Island to their Empire.

When this answer was returned, Appius having observed that so strong a Navy guarding the passage he could not without manifest danger cross over, plotted a very subtil and cunning device, he said, He did by no means desire that Hiero should be alienated from the Romans, that the war was not decreed against him, neither could be prosecuted without the peoples command. At a day therefore appointed he commanded his Sea-men to be ready, having their ships prepared for the voyage as if he would sail home. Now he was not ignorant that there were many both Carthaginian and Syracusan souldiers in the Rhegian Port, under the pretence of being Merchants, by whom he thought this news would quickly be conveyed to those who would have it true. And it hapned accordingly as he had foreseen, for he no sooner had entred into his ships on a clear Sun-shinie day, and sailed along the Italian shore but presently news was carried to the Carthaginian fleet which guarded the seas, whereupon they now not fearing the enemy would make any attempt that way, left the passage open, sailing themselves likewise away whither it pleased them. The Consul, who had forethought it would so come to passe, steared his course backward in the night time, and arrived in Sicily with his whole Navy, no body so much as observing, much lesse hindring his coming.

It was a bold Enterprize and full of hazard, for an army unskilful in sea-affaires, in the night time, blindly to venture with rude and illbuilt ships through a sea dangerous in it self, though it had not been dark, nor any enemy to be feared: And the exploit was thought worthy to be made known to Posterity, by a new Cognomen thereupon given to the Consul. For, because he made use of many vessels, made of the Trunks of trees, for the transportation of his souldiers, he was, in admiration of the fact, by the simplicity of that age surnamed Caudex, which signifieth the trunk of a tree. For the Romans having no use of sea affairs, had neither any covered ship or long boate, or good skiff in a businesse of such concernment as this was; but made use of those Triremes which the Tarentines and Locrians had lent the Eleats and Neapolitans, together with little vessels of Traffick of fifty Oars. But Appius landing not far from the place where the Syracusans had pitched their Camp, Encouraged his souldiers and declaring to them, The Victory would be certain if they came upon the Enemy unawares, immediately proceeded to assault their Camp. Hiero being awakened with the sudden tumult, marched out with what forces were ready; for a time the fight was very sharp, the Roman horsemen were beaten back, but the Legions stoutly standing to it, Hiero was overthrown, and with his men fearfully retreated into his works. Appius having commanded the dead bodies to be plunder'd, entred into Messana, freeing the Mamertines from great feare, and filling them with better hopes for hereafter. Hiero seeing himself beaten before he could see the enemy (as himself afterwards confessed), and suspecting that the Carthaginians had betrayed the passage over the sea, when he had revolved many things in his doubtful mind, began to be in fear of the main chance, and in the dead time of the next night he drew his army out of their Trenches, and marched directly without halting to Syracusa. When he was gone, Appius thought fit to make use of the terror of his late Victory in vanquishing the Carthaginians also, and having ordered his souldiers to refresh themselves in time, marched out in the dawning of the day, to assault the Carthaginian Camp, which was pitched in a very safe place, by nature and art, diligently fenced, for on one side the sea, on the other side deep Marshes and Bogs encompassed it in the form of a Peninsula: That narrow space of ground where was passage to firm land was fenced with a strong wall against all assaults. Here the Roman souldiers, beginning the storm, could not prevail against the strength of the place and multitude of defendants, but being beaten back with darts and stones (as in the storm of a City) they were forced to retire without having done their work.

Many times it hapneth in war that ill success in the beginning giveth occasion of better fortune, while they who are worsted endeavour with better advice and more courage to make up their losse, and the enemy on the other side being bewitched with a flattering opinion of felicity, and taking no heed against future chances, are carried away with rashness, as at this time it came to passe to the Carthaginians, for they not being content to have repulsed the enemies, issued out of their Camp and pursued them as if they had fled, thinking the Romans had yielded not so much to the difficulty of the place, as to their virtue and courage.

When therefore they were come out of their works, the fortune of the fight changed with the place, and a great number of them were slain, some fled into the Camp, others as they had convenience into the Cities round about, neither durst they any more stir out of their Camp as long as Claudius was at Messana. The Consul, considering the nature of the place and difficulty of its situation, thought it no wisdom to make a second assault, and seeing his time to be spent in vaine thereabouts; leaving a strong Garrison at Messana, Invaded the Territories of the Syracusans and their Confederats; and having without opposition wasted the Grounds, he conceived such Confidence, that he marched up with his army even to Syracuse it self: Where the Battel was very doubtful, and at one time the Consul was in great danger, and had certainly been surrounded and taken, had he not suddenly bethought himself and sent to Hiero, to treat on Conditions of peace. Hiero likewise sent a friend of his to consult about the businesse, and the discourse being on purpose drawn out in length, the Consul had time to bring his men into a place of greater security: The Syracusans likewise following the same example, had many treaties of peace with the Romans, and indeed an agreement had been made, but that Hiero was unwilling to be the author thereof. In these affaires the greater part of the year was spent; then the Consul returned to Messana, where leaving some forces to protect the Mamertines, with the rest of his men he crossed over to Rhegium: From thence he went to Rome to his Triumph which he made, over the Carthaginians and Hiero King of Sicily, with great joy of the People, as being the first over a Foreign Nation. This was the first of the Romans designs by sea, and such was the successe of their undertakings in Sicily. But these things and the actions of following times are much corrupted by the ambition of writers, the cheife whereof, Philinus Agrigentinus, and Fabius Pictor, the one striving to advance the Carthaginians Glory, the other the Romans, they both neglect their duty, and the truth of History: Whose Levity Polybim deservedly reprehends. For if even in private causes it be held an accursed Crime to circumvent any one by false Testimony; the author of an history is certainly to be esteemed more foully perfidious if he corrupt the acts of Princes and Commonwealths with falsehood: He ought to value truth more then any earthly Commodity or his own life, and the lesse deserveth pardon in that he cannot alledge so much as any faire pretence for his Lyes, for if he durst not for some causes freely speak all he knew, he might certainly without danger have held his Tongue. While Claudius in Sicily vanquisheth Hiero and the Carthaginians, M. Fulvius the other Consul bringeth the Volturnian siege to an Issue, having to deal with men who by despair were hardened and made valiant against all violence, he at length tameth them by famine. Upon delivery of the City, he did with exquisite torments put to death that unthankful and insolent crew of Libertines; the City it self he demolished, the other Volturnians who had not put off the faith of servants, and reverence toward their masters, he distributed into severall seats round about.

This war was likewise thought worthy of a Triumph, which the Consul made in the Calende of November, as over the Volturnians. While the same Consuls were in office a Lustration was performed by the Censors, Qu. Cornelius and C. Martius, and there were registered the names of two hundred ninety two thousand, two hundred twenty and four Citizens; a very great and almost incredible number to one who shall consider how many were lost in the wars, which hardly ever ceased since the foundation of the City; and how many were also swallowed up by the Pestilence and Malignant diseases as raging as the war it self. But indeed the Commonwealth was made invincible and not to be overcome by any calamity or slaughter whatsoever, by the wise advice of Romulus (which was constantly observed by posterity) in daily admitting new people into their City, insomuch that neither all the losses received by Pyrrhus, nor their many shipwracks in the first Punick war, nor the fights of Thrasimene and Canna in the second, were able so much to afflict it, but that still she did rise more chearful, free and valiant out of all her troubles.

But in Greece the Lacedaemonians who were also very famous for their Discipline and Valour in war, not any whit inferior to the Romans, because they forbade strangers to coinhabit with them, were not long able to uphold their Dominion, nor long after to maintain their Freedom; when in the Leuctrian battel they lost not much more then a thousand men, their Empire presently fell to the ground; and at Sellasia with the losse of not quite six thousand, their Liberty was taken away. But the Achaens, inhabitants of the same Peloponnesus, admitting freely any neighbours into equal priviledges with themselves, did constitute a very fair and flourishing Commonwealth, and likely to have continued, had not some few of them, to their own and their Countries destruction, madly provoked the Romans, whose power then was grown formidable to all people. Such divers events are necessarily consequent to divers institutions: For as in nature it is agreeable, that those bodies who are to a competent measure daily refreshed with wholeme food, should be stronger and longer lived then those who content with their own natural ingenite moisture despise all nourishment from without: so it stands to reason, that those Cities should better flourish, who admit into themselves and make their own what in any other place they find to be excellent, then those, who by a foolish arrogance, despising whatsoever groweth not in their own soil, deprive themselves of many good assistants in obtaining and preserving their power and sovereignty.

This year gave a beginning to a cruel custom, which afterward was frequently and most intemperately usurped. That the blood of man should become a publick spectacle of pleasure, being profusely shed for the sake of any mean and wanton spectator. The authors of this barbarous custome were M. and D. Junius Brutus, who by a strange kind of piety, intending to honour the Ashes of their dead father, did with great favour of the Citizens exhibit a Fencing-Shew. But this injury to mankind was most severely revenged by a Pestilence, which all this and the next year did furiously rage. Concerning which when they had consulted the books of the Sybills, 'twas found the anger of the gods was the cause thereof. There arising therefore a suspicion that their Religious affairs were not rightly handled, the Priests by diligent observation and inquisition, found that many Chappels and Temples were converted into the use of private men, and that Capparonia, a Vestal Nun, was guilty of Incest; she prevented her doom by hanging her self, but he who had corrupted her, together with those servants who were privy to the fact, were executed according to Law. The holy places were redeemed out of private hands to their wonted use. So having cleared the City in matters of Religion, the Fathers applied their minds again to the care of the Commonwealth; and because Etruria being appeased, there was no commotion in Italy, they ordered both the new Consuls to be sent into Sicily with their Legions: the Consuls were M. Valerius Maximus the eldest son of Marcus, who in the time of his office was called Messalla, and M. Otacilius Crassus; C.F. M.N. These having safely transported their forces were attended with the same good fortune. For when after their taking the City of the Adranites by storm they had laid siege unto Centuripa, there came Embassadors to them from the Alasines, offering to deliver up their town.

Thence the Consuls, marching through several parts of the Island, sometimes with their forces joyned, sometimes asunder, as they saw cause, overcoming both Carthaginian and Syracusan, as often as they durst stand to the hazard of a Battel, spread their fame and Terrour round about: And such was their happinesse in following their fortune, and so great their force, that in a while after their were reckoned sixty seven Cities which had committed themselves to their Protection, in which number were the Tauromenitans and the Caratians: Out of which Cities the Consuls leaving what Auxiliaries they pleased, did daily increase in strength, and, pitching the Camp neere unto Syracuse it self, consulted about the siege of it. Which thing Hiero maturely considering, when he began to distrust in his own and the Carthaginian Forces, and withal thought the Romans were best to be trusted, he resolved to enter into League with the Romans; and in order thereunto sent Embassadors to the Consuls to treat of Peace. Neither were the Romans at all averse from making freindship with Hiero to separate him from the Carthaginians, especially because thereby they might more easily supply their Legions with Corne for food. For the Carthaginians having command of the seas, they could not have Provision from Italy, by which incommodity the former Consul reaped more trouble then from the enemy. But, when Hiero was once united to them, the Kingdome of Syracuse being very fruitful, would plentifully afford them all Necessaries. The Peace therefore was concluded on these Articles, That what places or prisoners Hiero had taken from the Romans or their associates he should restore without ransom, and likewise pay an hundred Talents of silver; that he should without molestation raigue over Syracuse and all Cities under the Syracusan Jurisdiction; the chief whereof were Acra, Leontium, Myra, Elorus, Netini, Tauromenium. The Embassadors being thence sent to Rome, the same Conditions were there confirmed, and the Senate decreed that Peace should be maintained with that King, and after a few dayes Cn. Arius Calpurnius propounding it to the people, they likewise assented. This League, being made for fifteen years, was perpetually kept enviable: Hiero bearing such Respect to the Roman Greatnesse and they so bountifully requiting his good affection, that neither of them had cause to repent of their freindship. Hannibal the Carthaginian, being come as far as Xiphonia with his sea forces, to raise the siege of Syracuse, having Intelligence of the Peace, returned with greater hast then he came. The Romans being now strengthened by Hiero their associate and fellow souldier, made no delay, but quickly reduced many Cities from the Carthaginian Jurisdiction. From Adranon, a fenced village, and Macella, after many dayes siege they returned without effecting their Purpose: But the Segeltans they received into protection, when they had slaine the Carthaginian Garrison and voluntarily revolted to them: Among other Considerations, they said they Loved the Romans for Kindred sake, deriving their Pedigree from Aeneas after his flight from Troy. And not long after the Alienians came into the Romans; But at Hilarus, Territus and Asclius they were faine to use force and Engines, and therefore dealt the more severely with the vanquished party. Whereupon the Tyndaritan, being terrified, seeing themselves next to danger, and help far from them, Entred into Consultation about yielding themselves to the Romans, but were prevented by the Carthaginians; for they, suspecting what was in hand, sent away the cheife of the Citie as Hostages to Lilybaeum; and took in good store of Corne and wine and other provisions. About this time the severity of Ottacilius Crassus the Consul was of much advantage to the Roman Discipline, for those souldiers who being taken by Hannibal, had basely, for safeguard of their lives, submitted themselves to bondage, he caused to continue without the Camp to receive the first charge from the enemy, that so, having no fence but their own courage, they might be the more valiant, trusting only in their own courage, and not to any security of the place they stood in.

After these and other exploits of no greater moment, winter now approaching, the Consuls disposing several Garrisons in convenient places, returned into Italy and so to Rome with the residue of their Armies. There was a Triumph decreed to M. Valerius (whose successe and pains had been most remarkable) over the Carthaginians and Hiero, which was performed the sixteenth of the Calends of April. Among the spoils was brought a Clock, which is therefore taken notice of, because it was the first which was seen at Rome; it was taken at Calina, and by Valerius.

Valerius placed upon a Pillar in publick near the Rostra: He also on the side of the Court built by Hoftilius set up a Table, whereon was painted the Battel wherein he overcame Hiero and the Carthaginians, which before his time was not done by any man, but afterward by many. This Valerius had his Surname Messalla from Messana; but I wonder that some Authors of no small note should imagine it was derived from his taking that City, whereas the series of affairs doth evidently demonstrate, that it rather proceeded from his delivering that City from the troubles it sustained (after Appius Claudius his departure) from the Carthaginians and Hiero, removing the one enemy and reconciling the other.

In the mean while the Pestilence still raging, a Dictator was named for the knocking in of a Nail, who was Cn. Fulvius, Cn. F. Cn. N. Maximus Centumalus, he chose for Master of the Horse L. Marcins, Q. F. Q. N. Philippus. In the same year the Aesernian Colony was planted, whereas the year before one was deduced to Firmum, or as some will have it to Castrum. After this L. Posthumus, L. F. L. N. Megellus, and Q. Mumilius, Q. F. M. N. Vitulus were created Consuls, and both of them had Sicily allotted for their Province: There were but two Legions allowed them, which were thought sufficient, because now having Amity with Hiero the war was more easie; they considered likewise that provisions would be the better procured if the Army were but small. The Consuls having transported their forces into Sicily, and being joyned with their associates, passing by things of lesser moment, thought fit with their whole strength to besiege Agrirentum, which City the Carthaginians had plentifully furnished with all manner of accommodations, intending it for the Magazine of their wars. For they seeing Hiero had forsaken them, and that the Romans made Sicily their chiefest care, they thought it behooved them to make the more diligent preparation for the war. In the first place therefore they sent the greater part of their forces into Sardinia, to lie in wait against the Italian shore, by that means to divert the Romans from Sicily, or at least to compel them to send the smaller forces then otherwise they would have done.

But being frustrated of their hopes (for the Romans had strength sufficient, both wherewith to guard their own Coasts, and invade Sicily with a new army) they hired many Mercenary souldiers of the Ligurians and Gauls, but more out of Spain, whom together with great plenty of provisions, they sent to Agrirentum, resolving to make that their Magazine of Corne, and the Receptacle of their Armies; being, by reason of its conveniency of situation, and multitude of buildings, fitter for such occasions then any other Citie of Sicily of their Jurisdiction. The onely seat of War therefore being about that Citie, the Romans; having confined the Carthaginians within their works, pitched their Camp within a mile thereof. The grain was then ripe in the fields, and because they foresaw the siege would prove long, the souldiers sent out to reape and bring in Corne, wandered somewhat too far and more carelessly then ought to have been done having an enemy so near. The Carthaginians omitted not to make use of this occasion, and had indeed given a great overthrow to the Romans, but that they regained as much by their courage, as they had lost by their negligence. For, when they who were sent out to forrage were not able to resist the assault of the Enemy, the Carthaginians pursued them even to the Camp, where deviding their forces, some prepared to storme the workes, while the others maintained the fight with the guards without. Then, as often at other times, the Laws of warfare duely observed and the incorrupted Rigour of the Roman Discipline saved them from an hazard tending to the destruction of their whole army. For (it being a deadly crime among the Romans for any cause whatsoever to forsake their station) the guard without, knowing it was to no purpose to fly back, though they were much overpowered in number, maintained the fight with wonderful courage, losing many of their own men, but killing more of the enemies, till the Troupes had time to arme themselves and come to their Relief, so the Enemy being there repulsed, and those who had now almost entred the workes surrounded, the Romans made a very great slaughter of them, and pursued the rest even to the Citie. This accident made both the Enemy more fearful of Issuing out, and the Romans more wary in their Forrage. Henceforth the heat of their Contention being not so great as before, (for the Carthaginians seldom made a sally, and then only in manner pickeering and light skirmish) the Romans thought fit to divide their forces, and plant their Camps on two sides of the Citie, on the one side near to Esculapius his Temple, on the other in the high way leading to Heraclea. Their Camps were fenced with Trenches on both sides, toward the Citie, against their Sallies, and toward the Country both to secure themselves from any invasion, and to hinder Relief from entering the Citie. The space between the two Camps was guarded with many companyes of souldiers.

In all these affaires they were much assisted by the Sicilians, who lately had made friendship with them, of whom together with the Romans there were an hundred thousand; They brought provisions as far as Erbessus, from whence (it being not far off) the Romans fetched it into their Campe. Whereby they had very great plenty of all Necessaries. At this stay the siege continued for almost five moneths, neither much prevailing over the other (for they attempted nothing but light skirmishes) till at length the Carthaginians began to have the worst on't. For a great number of men, little lesse then fifty thousand warriors, having been so long shut up in one town, had spent almost all their corn, and saw no likelyhood of procuring more, the Romans guarding all the passages, so that they were much afflicted both with their present misery, serie, and expectation of future. Therefore Hannibal the son of Gisco (who was Commander in chief at Aggrigentum) by many messengers craving relief against hunger and other dangers, Hanno the elder was sent into Sicily with some Elephants and Souldiers which were for that purpose raised. His Army consisted of fifty thousand foot, six thousand horse, and threescore Elephants, with which forces he sailed to Lilybaum, thence he marched to Heraclea, whither forthwith came messengers promising to deliver up Erbesus to him: Being by their means made master of Erbesus (from whence the Romans hitherto had all their provisions) he seemed to have effected a business of great moment, as much afflicting the Romans now for want of necessaries as they had done the Aggrigentines.

Polybim

Polybim

And now the Romans began to consult about raising the siege, which they were very near giving over for a desperate business, had not the King of Syracuse, by trying all wayes, made a shift by stealth to convey to them some corn and other commodities, whereby their present want was in some measure relieved. Hanno considering the Romans now to be faint with hunger and other infirmities following it, whereas his own men were well and lusty and in perfect strength, approached near the Romans, resolving, if occasion were offered, to fight them. Marching therefore with his fifty Elephants, and whole army from Heraclea, he sends his Numidian horsemen before to play about the enemies Camp, to provoke the Roman horsemen, and, if possible, to draw them out into ambush. The Numidians according to order carelessly flying about the Consul's Camp, the Romans issue out, beat back those who opposed, and pursued them as they fled out of order, that way which they knew Hanno to be coming. The further they followed the pursuit, the more difficult was their return to their own works, insomuch that many of them were lost after they had met with fresh forces, which caused those who fled likewise to turn and fight. Hanno being by this much encouraged with hopes of the main Victory, placeth himself upon an hill called Torus, about a mile and a half distance from the Roman Camp; nevertheless the battle was deferred longer then was expected between two Armies so near one the other; sometimes the Carthaginian, sometimes the Roman unwilling to hazard their whole fortune in one battle, while Hanno was desirous to fight, the Romans contained themselves within their Trenches, because they were exceeded by the enemy both in number and chearfulness, being themselves terrified and dejected with the losse their horsemen had sustained.

Zonaras

But when they, (seeing their associates troubled and daunted at this their fear, the Enemy on the contrary grow more confident, and thinking it better to fight with the Carthaginians then endure such want) were resolved upon the Battle; then Hanno began to fear, and decline the encounter. Two months were thus spent: nothing of greater moment being performed, but light skirmishes which happened every day. At length, being moved with frequent entreaties from Hannibal, who had daily sent out Messengers, and by lighted fires given him often notice, That the besieged were no longer able to endure hunger, and that many were thereby compelled to flee to the enemy; Hanno was resolved no longer to defer the battle, giving order to Hannibal at the same time to issue out of the City. The Consuls having intelligence hereof, kept themselves very quietly within their Camps; Hanno the more furiously presents himself in Battle array, marcheth up to their very Works, boldly provokes them to fight, reproaching them with fear and cowardize. They on the contrary being content to repulse the enemy from their Trenches, neither ranged battle against them while they stood, nor pursued them when they retreated. When things had been thus transacted for some dayes together, and the Carthaginians were fully perswaded the Romans durst not venture on any further action, L. Posthumus the Consul wisely made use of the enemies security and contempt to his own good. For silently ordering his whole battle within the works, when the Carthaginians according to their custome came up to the works, he issued out with a few and held them in action, with light skirmishes from day break till noon, then the enemy withdrawing themselves, he brought forth his Legions and made a charge upon them.

Hanno, though he saw a necessity of fighting contrary to his expectation, stoutly entering into battle, maintained it doubtful till the day was almost spent. But the Romans, having on purpose well refreshed their bodies and prepared them to fight, were not so much troubled with heat, thirst and Labour as were the Carthaginians, who, before the battle, being weary with fasting and standing all day, the longer they fought, were the less able to resist by reason of the weakness of their Bodies. At length the Mercenary souldiers who stood in the front were no longer able to endure the brunt, and did not only give back themselves, but falling in disorderly upon the Elephants and other Regiments behind, routed the whole battle and caused them to fly before the enemy who so hotly charged them. Things were managed with the same successe in the other place, for Hannibal, issuing out to fight, was beaten back with the greater losse, and forced into the City again. The Carthaginian Camp was taken, three Elephants wounded, thirty slain, eleven came alive into the Romans hands: The men had the same fortune, for of so great an Army very few escaped with their General to Heraclea, they who were shut up in the City, seeing no way or means of safety left them, were afflicted with very great terror and despair: When Hannibal following the best counsel his ill fortune had left him, observing that the Romans, what with weariness of their late fight, and joy of their Victory, kept not their guards so strickt as heretofore, about the third watch of the night went out of the Town with his Mercenaries, and having crossed the Trenches filled up with boats stuffed with straw (which he had beforehand prepared for this purpose) he was a good way on his journey before the Romans; at break of day perceiving what was in hand, surprised part of the hindmost Troops; Hannibal with the rest betook himself into places of security. The Agri- gentines seeing themselves forsaken by the Carthaginians, either out of anger, or to curry favour with the Conqueror, slew many of those who remained in the City. The Town was not therefore saved from destruction, above five and twenty thousand Free-men were sold into slavery.

In this manner was Agri- gentum taken, in the seventh moneth after it had been first besieged, to the great profit and glory of the Romans, but with the expence of much blood, for of the Consul's Army and his Auxiliaries, there perished by several means above thirty thousand during this siege; for which cause, and by reason winter now approaching, nothing of moment could be undertaken, they returned to Messana. These Commanders going to Rome in hope of Triumph, the next year L. Valerius, M.F. M.N. Flaccus, and T. Otacilius, C.F. M.N. Crassus being made Consuls went into Sicily. The Carthaginians having set forth a great Navy as to the plunder and wasting of Italy, thought thereby to divert the Consuls from the care of Sicily, but they having sufficient guard upon the coasts to repel the invaders, did nevertheless cross over into Sicily, where they received many towns which yielded themselves to their protection, being terrified by the late example of the Agri- gentine overthrow. The Carthaginians in the mean time made no resistance, for besides their late ill success they were vexed with the sedition of their Mercenaries, the Gauls being chief in the Mutiny for want of many moneths pay; for the punishment of whom, Hanno devised this stratagem, first soothing them with fair speeches he desires them, At present for a while to be quiet, telling them, He was in certain hopes of suddenly surprising a very rich Town, by the plunder whereof the Gauls should be sufficiently satisfied, both for their pay, as also for the forbearance of it. Having by this means at present appeased them, and moreover received thanks, he takes a convenient time to treat with his Treasurer, (who was most faithful to him) That he would, as a Runegado, flee over to Otacilius the Consul, under pretence of having perverted his Accounts, and inform him, That next night he might circumvent four thousand Gauls, who would come to Entellia to take it with the help of some Traitors within.

The Consul though he gave not much Credit to a Runegado, yet thinking it a business not to be neglected, did send a Choice Brigade of souldiers upon the design; the Gauls came accordingly as they had been deceived by Hanno; and the Romans suddenly arising out of ambush to receive them, there was between them a very fierce and cruel fight, wherein every one of the Gauls were slain and because they died not unrevenge, Hanno was doubly pleased, both that he was rid of his insolent Mercenary, and that he had cunningly punished them to the no little loss of the enemy. At Rome, in the mean time, Alibi- cius the Praetor propounded in the Senate, the bringing of the water of the River Anio to the City, which work M. Curius the Censor had designed out of the enemies Spoils, but several impediments arising, the business for nine years deferred, was now again consulted about; and two men appointed as supervisors, Publius and Fulvius Flaccus, but Publius dying within five days, the Glory of finishing the work was attributed to Fulvius alone. About the same time Hamilcar came from Carthage into Sicily as successor to Hanno. For the Carthaginians, when Hanno returned after his overthrow, received him with Ignominy; fined him in his six thousand pieces of Gold and removed him from his Government. Some Authors being deceived by the likeness of Names, have delivered, that this Amilcar was Father of Hannibal who managed the second Punick War against the Romans; but not rightly, for Hamilcar the Father of Hannibal came into Sicily with command, being but a young man, at the latter end of this War, but his great fame prevailed, that the acts of another less known Amilcar were ascribed to Amilcar Barca the most Noble and Egregious of that Name. Hamilcar therefore the successor of Hanno seeing the Romans far stronger then himself in their land army, durst not assault any In-Land Cities, nor descend out of the Mountaines and difficult places into the Campagne; but having a strong Navy whereby he was doubtless Master of the seas, made diligent use of those his Forces, and, having sent Hannibal againe to plunder the Coasts of Italy, himself sailing about the Sicilian shore, easily recovered many Port Townes which had joyned themselves with the Romans. Whereby it came to passe, that the Romans easily taking and defending the In-Land places, the Carthaginians the Matitime; the Feare and hopes were on both sides very equal, and it was hard to Judge to which of these two Nations the Victory of the whole War would chuse.

B O O K V I I.

OUR years were now expired since the Carthaginian war began, neither had the Romans any cause to complain either of their own courage or fortune; for they were Victors in every battel, both over Carthaginians and Syraculans as often as they durst encounter: They had taken many rich Cities by storm, and others upon Articles submitted themselves; but as long as they waged war in an Island, they could not at their pleasure find provisions and recruits when they were required. And the Carthaginian ships with free and unexpected arrival being themselves secure, did not only molest and vex the Sicilian Cities upon the shore, but likewise wasted the coasts of Italy, both to the losse of the Roman Empire, and likewise to their disgrace; whereas the African shore was clear and free from the enemies invasion. The Senate therefore and people of Rome diligently consulting upon the matter, did resolve to prepare a Fleet, and fight the Carthaginians not only by land, as hitherto they had done, but to try their fortune at sea also. This was the very first serious thought the Romans had concerning sea affairs, which they accomplished with as much Courage and good Fortune, as they had conceived it with Wisdom and Resolution: Infomuch as the Empire of the whole world might well be judged due to the Romans, who being willing by sea to encounter a people most skilful in sea affairs, wanted neither Boldnesse to attempt it, nor Diligence to manage it, nor Constancy effectually to perform it. For the Romans to that day being so utterly ignorant of sea affairs, that there was not a man amongst them who ever had seen one, neither had any one Man of War of their own, or any Carpenter who knew how to build one, yet having with great confidence undertaken the design, they did in a very short time both learn to sail and venture to fight and overcame those people who for many ages had had experience in sea affairs.

The care of building the ships was committed to Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. N. Scipio Africanus, and C. Dardanius, who had newly entred the Consulship. They had one Carthaginian ship of five Oars, which Claudius took with his foot army (at what time he was studying to passe over into Sicily) while in heat of fight it came too near the shore and was grounded upon the sands in a shallow place. The Consuls ordered the whole Navy to be built after that Patterne, and so diligently prosecuted the work, that in threescore days after the timber was felled, they had threescore ships standing at Anchor. But the Consuls hastned their expedition no less by their wit, then by their Industry, For, (being neither willing to hazard to fight with men unskilful at the oar, nor yet to streighten the time allotted them for action in training up and exercising men on purpose) they contrived a device, which though it may at first shew seem ridiculous, yet in the use and event proved exceeding Commendable. That, while the ships were in building, their Men should sit on shore and there be taught their office how to Rowe. For being placed in the same order as they were to observe in the ships, and a Boatswaine being set in the midst of them, they were commanded, at his word given, to move their Oars, and again to forbear, even as if they were sailing.

By this exercising themselves in fancy onely they were so improved, that when the ships were ready, after a few daies real paines-taking, the Consuls were willing to trust themselves and the safety of all their Legions to their care. When lots were cast for the Provinces, the Land Army fell to C. Duilius, the Fleet to Cn. Cornelius; who, taking along with him seventeen ships, sailed before hand to Messana, to make preparation for the coming of the Fleet, which he ordered suddenly to follow him: but before it came, he fell into the hands of the Enemy, which came to passe by the cunning of Boodes, Hannibal's Vice-Admirall, and his own Credulity, giving credit to some Liparæans, who were suborned by the Enemy, to put him in hopes of taking the City of Lipara by Treachery. There being circumvented by the Carthaginian ships, he nevertheless resolved to encounter them, and seek his safety by fighting: but that Boodes by another fraud, trained him and his Colonells into his own ship, under pretence of Treating on Conditions of Peace. They were no sooner come but clapt up in chaines, the others being hereby terrified did without blowes yield themselves up; Boodes gaining all the Vessels, sent the Prisoners to Carthage. Soon after the Carthaginian Commander committed the like fault to his greater shame, in that the fresh example of the Consul's incogitancy did not learn him to be more circumspect. He had understood that the Roman Navy sailing by the Italian shore, was putting forth to sea, and that they could not now be farre off. Desiring therefore, as neer as might be, to observe it, that he might accurately know the number of their ships, their swiftness, and in what fashion and plight their new made Vessels were in, he sailed forward with fifty ships, not foreseeing any danger, his ships being confusedly mixed without any order, as when they ride in Harbour or any safe place: At the turning therefore of a certain Promontory, suddenly falling into the Roman Fleet, which came prepared and sailing in good order; he was vanquished before he could prepare himself to fight, and having lost the greater part of his Navy, himself likewise being in great Danger, he very hardly escaped with the rest. The Victorious Navy, understanding Cornelius his mishap, sent Messengers to C. Duilius to give him notice of their approach, and prepared themselves for fight, having intelligence that the other Carthaginian ships were not farre off. There while they diligently considered the inconvenience of their own Vessels, that they were rudely made, and farre inferiour to the Carthaginians in swiftness, it came into the mind of a certain ingenious man to invent an Engine, whereby to lay hold and keep fast the Enemies ships; which Engine they afterward called a Raven, or Crow; the fashion of it was this. There was a straight round piece of Timber, four ulnes long, some nine inches Diameter, having at the end thereof a pully or windlase, to which, being fixed on the foredeck, there was fitted a bridge, six ulnes broad, and four feet long, made of planks fastned together with iron nails. In this Engine there was left a long hole whereby it might be fitted to the piece of Timber, by the space of four ulnes, even the whole length of the Timber. The other part of the bridge or ladder, which was not inserted in the Timber, being of two ulnes long, was so fastned by hinges, that it might be pulled up, or let fall; to the end of the bridge was affixed a strong sharp piece of iron, with a ring at it's head, whereto a rope being tied, through the pully of the timber, it might be drawn down into the Foredecke; Then as they lifted, by the Rope they could draw it up, or let it fall down, with its sharp piece of iron laying hold on and keeping fast whatsoever it fell upon. In the mean time the Consul C. Duilius, committing his foot Army to the Charge of his Colonells, came to the Navy, and understanding that the Enemies spoiled the Region of Mylais, sailed with his whole fleet to that shore.

The Carthaginians were glad of this, assuredly promising themselves victory over Inland-men, altogether unskilfull in sea affaires; whereby they became an example, That no Enemy whatsoever ought so to be despised, as to cause one to remit ordinary discipline, and grow secure. Hannibal the Admirall, who had conveyed his Forces out of Agrigentum, was in a Vessel of seven oares on a side, which formerly belonged to King Pyrrhus, the other ships followed him: not as to a fight, in any distinct order, but, as every one thought fit, making hast to their despicable Enemy. But, when approaching neerer, they saw the Engines hanging at the foredecks of the Roman ships, wondering at the novelty of the business, they paused a while, at length the most Couragious men laughing at the rude invention of an unskilfull Enemy, the foremost ships with all the violence that might be flew upon them. Then the Crows being let down, into what ships soever they light, so pierced the planks thereof that they held them fast against their wills; The Roman souldiers, if the ships were fastned side to side, did on every part leap in and assault the Enemy; if they were joyned onely in the foredecks, they went two by two over the bridge annexed to the timber, with so much the more facility, because on each side of the bridge a little fence knee high, made their passage safer, and their footing more secure: They who went foremost, holding their bucklers before, defended their faces from the Enemies darts, those who followed held their shields down to the little fence, so guarding their sides, and entering the Enemies ships; so that the fight was not performed with the Beakes of ships, but with swords and hands, like to a set Battell; The Romans therefore excelling in strength and Courage, had an easy victory over men lightly armed, and trusting more in the nimbleness of their ships, then in their hands; They quickly forced thirty Carthaginian ships, among which the Admiralls frigot was taken, but Hannibal leaping out of his ship, when it was now taken, into a Cock-boat escaped Captivity, and sending a trusty friend in post-haste to Carthage, to prevent the News of his Overthrow, did thereby cunningly decline that Capitall punishment which otherwise had attended him. His friend entring the Senate, as if all things had been well, well, asked their Advice, whether they thought it fit that the Roman Navy should be fought withall? and every one unanimously agreeing, That there was no scruple to be made, and that the business should not be deferred; he told them, 'Tis already done, and we are beaten; whereupon, no body daring to accuse the Fact, whereof every one in his own Person would have been Author, Hannibal escaped the sentence of Death, but was deprived of his Admirallship. The rest of the Carthaginian ships, (for the greater part was left) after the Flight of the Admirall, were very much troubled and doubtful in Counsell what to do; they were ashamed to fly having received no harm, the Enemy not so much as pressing upon them; on the other side to sit upon the Roman ships they were afraid, by reason of their Engines; At length sailing round about, and finding on every side the foredecks of the ships opposed against them, with those formidable Engines, having used all the art they could, they despairing of the victory went their way.

'Tis reported that fourteen Carthaginian ships were sunk in that fight, one and thirty taken with seven thousand men, three thousand having been slain. With this success did C. Duilius fight with the Carthaginians neer the Liparaan Islands, where the Romans got much prey, but much more ample Glory and Renown. The Consull taking charge again of his Land Army, Marched to Segesta, and delivered it from danger, it having been brought even to the utmost extremity by the Carthaginians; after that he took Macella by storme, Hamilcar never daring to encounter with him: and so having confirmed the mindes of the Associate Cities, Summer being past, he returned to Rome: After his departure the Carthaginian affaires began again to prosper. For first the Romans after seven moneths continuance were faine to raise their siege of Mutistratus, having lost many men before it. When afterward a Dissension arose between the Romans and their Auxiliaries, and that the Associates encamped themselves apart between Paropus and Therma: Hamilcar thought fit to make use of this their madness, and falling on them unawares slew four thousand of them: and it wanted little but that the whole Roman Army had likewise been involved in the same overthrow.

Then again many Townes were taken by Hannibal, some by force, some by Treachery: which though it was no good newes at Rome, yet the loss was counted small in respect of their Navall Victory. For the Roman courage having already approved it self invincible by Land, they had great cause to rejoyce, that by this Fight they had gained reputation of strength by sea also. Whereupon wonderfully encouraging themselves as to the whole Warre, they judged the Author of this their New Glory worthy also of new Honour, Duilius therefore was the First who ever made a Navall Triumph, which was on the Intercalary Calends over the Sicilians and the Carthaginian Navy. They likewise bore with him, when, not content with this Honour, he did without all precedent assume another to himselfe, that coming from supper, a light Torch was carried before him while the Minstrells Sang; A Beaked Pillar likewise was by decree of the Senate erected in the Market-place, of white Parian Marble, which is yet to be seen (but many of the Letters worn out with Age) containing the Number of ships taken and drowned, the Summ and Weight of the Money taken. There were taken of Gold three thousand seven hundred pieces, of silver above an hundred thousand, of heavy Brasse seven score hundred thousand pounds. The Triumph being accomplished, Duilius called an Assembly, wherein L. Cornelius, L. J. Cn. N. Scipio and C. Aquilius M. F. C. N. were chosen Consuls. The Senate ordered their Provinces to be Sicily, and the Navy. The Admirall had permission, if he thought it for the Publick good, to touch upon Sardinia and Corsica. This Charge happening to L. Cornelius, having prepared his ships he sailed away.

This was the first Roman expedition into Sardinia and Corsica; the Islands are so near adjoining that they seem but one and the same, yet much unlike, as in the temper of the Air and Soil, so in the Dispositions of the inhabitants. Sardinia as bearing the shape of a mans footing, was by the Ancients called Ichnusa and Sandalotis; afterwards 'tis said, That Sardus the son of Hercules of Lybia much frequenting the Island, gave it the name it is now known by. Old Fables affirm that the Grecians came into those places with Ariflaas, and after the Trojan war the Trojans. For extent of ground and fruitfulness of soil, it yieldeth not much to the biggest and best Islands of those seas. It breeds excellent cattel, very fruitful it is of the best Corn, rich in Metals, especially Silver. But the air is not so wholesome, inasmuch as forreign Nations commended not so much its Fertility as they dispraised its Pestilent air; for in Summer it is sickly especially in the most fruitful places. It produceth likewise an Herb, much like the Bee flower of very violent Poyson, being eaten it distracteth the mind, and forcibly attracting the Nerves distorteth the lips as in laughter: the juice of it is mortal, unless after vomiting you drink good store of milk and honyed water: the present force of the disease is so remedied, the other incommodities thereof are cured by the same means as other Convulsions of the Nerves.

Likewise there is a very little creature called Aspuga, a kind of Pismire, which is deadly to those who unawares sit upon it, it is so much the more dangerous, because hardly to be seen or taken notice of by those who are ignorant of its nature. The Sardinians being a Nation mixed of divers sorts of Barbarians, when they are left to their own liberty, chuse rather to live by robbery and plunder, then by husbandry: They are armed with a Target and short Sword, their Brest-plates they sew together the out skins of their Rams, which they call Musmones, bearing not wooll as others, but in stead thereof hair like Goats. Their chiefest City is Caralis, looking towards Africa and from thence built, with a very fair Haven. Corfica is not to be compared with Sardinia either for largeness of Territorie, or for Riches, yet is thought to be the third in bigness of all those Islands. The inhabitants derive the name from one Corfa a woman, out of whose Heard a Bull crossed over into this Island from Liguria; the Greeks called it Cyrnus. It is Mountainous and Rugged, in many places almost impassible; and the people like to the earth are very rough, without ordinary civility, as untractable as the wild beasts. When they are taken prisoners they hardly grow gentle, but either out of impatience of labour and servitude kill themselves, or by their contumacy and stubbornness are troublesome to their masters.

The Island is plentiful in Honey, but it is of a bitter tast, much like the flower of Box, which tree in great number groweth there; yet it is very wholesome, and many think your Corficans to be therefore long-lived, because they ordinarily use that Honey. Their Towns are not very great nor very populous, yet there is above thirty of them, the principal whereof are Aleria a Colony of the Phocæans, and Nicaa of the Etrurians. The Air is here very troublesome, and therefore the seas rough. The Carthaginians therefore had long wars with these nations, and obtained the dominion of both Islands, except places inaccessible. But because wild and rude men were easier to be vanquished then tamed, they bethought themselves of many means whereby to keep them under, they likewise corrupted all the fruits of the Island, and under pain of death prohibited the Natives to sow or plant any such thing, that they might be forced to fetch all necessaries from Africa, till at length grown somewhat more gentle they learned with patience to bear the yoke.

To these Islands at this time did Cn. Cornelius steer his course, and first in Corfica stormed the City Aleria, after which without much labour or danger he took the rest. From thence as he sailed towards Sardinia, he met the enemies Fleet, which he presently put to flight before they came to grapple. After this he went to Olbia, where seeing many Carthaginian ships in the Haven, and thinking himself not strong enough in foot to storm a City so well situate, and defended by a great multitude, for the present he omitted the business, and sailed home for a recruit of men.

Grosius 4.7

About the same time a servile Commotion, in the Citie, which was in the beginning happily suppressed, did both afflict the Commonwealth with great fear, and likewise secure it. Many out of the new conquered Nations, were pressed for sea service, whereof there were then four thousand in Rome, most of them being Samnites, who being oppressed by the Romans, did secretly bemoane their own Condition and so far exasperated one another that they were resolved to burn the Citie and plunder it: They had already drawn in above three thousand accomplices into the conspiracy, which daily gathered more strength, when Erinus Potelius, Commander of the Auxiliaries, did by his wisdom prevent all danger. For he feigning himself engaged in the same faction, was made privie to all their Contrivances, he was acquainted with the number of them, nay, with the nation, and name of every particular person in the conspiracy; he knew the place and the time where and when they intended to act any thing. He now wanted nothing to the accomplishment of his own private design, but onely to discover theirs to the Senate, but thither he could not find no opportunitie of going, because the Samnites would never suffer him to walk alone; at length having devised this trick, he perswadeth them, That when the Senate next met, they should come by bands into the market-place, and complain that they were cheated in the Measure of their Corn, that then they should have occasion offered of executing their Purpose, or at least understand of what mind and opinion the Fathers will be in upon such sudden motions and stirr. And to gaine the more Credit in the business, he went along with them, manifesting himself not onely a Companion in the Tumult, but the Author and Ringleader of it. Whereupon being called into the Senate he discovered to them the danger of the secret Plot and cause of his own dissimulation. The Fathers, taking no notice of what they knew, sent Messengers with good words to pacifie the Rout, and command them home, assuring them with all, That the Senate would take order for Redresse of their Grievance, and that every one should enjoy his Right. The Conspiratours, thinking their Designs was still kept close, went their way: The night following every Master bound his servants, whom according to Potelius his Information, he knew guilty of the treason, the Samnites also were most of them seized upon in their Quarters. Either the care of this or some other business, or sickness was an hindrance to C. Florus, that he did not goe into Sicily so soon as ordinary; whereby Hamilcar after his last Victorie had time much to encrease the Carthaginian Power there. For having taken Camarina and Enna by Treachery, he fortified Drepanus, where was a very fair Haven, and enlarged it in forme of a Town, bringing the Erycines thither to Dwell, whose Citie, lest it should be servicable to the Romans he totally demolished, excepting the Temple of Venus. After this he reduced many other places under his power either by deceit or by force, and was in a likelihood of conquering all Sicily, but that Florus, for this reason not daring in winter to forsake the Island, carried to oppose him. The other Consul had an Easier Taske with the Sardinians and Carthaginians at Olbia; whether being returned with encrease of strength, he found Hanno there, who after the removal of Hannibal was made Admiral. The battel waxing vehemently hot, Hanno courageously fighting, seeing his own party worsted, rushed in to the thickest of the Enemies and was there slain: After which the Town yielded itself. The Consul much graced the fame of his Victory by his singular humanity toward the Enemy. For he took care to have the Body of Hanno to be conveyed out of his Cabbin to Burial, and made a large Funeral for him, laying aside hatred after Death, and rightly judging that virtue is to be honoured even in an enemy. Then not suffering the Terror of his late Victory to grow stale and be forgotten, he took many other Cities of Sardinia, furthering his Courage with Counsells and stratagems. For he used in the night time to land some choice bands not far off those townes he meant to assault, who conveniently placing themselves in Ambush lay quiet, till the Consul coming to the walls and giving an Alarm, had under pretence of Flight drawn the Townsmen a good way out of their works, then they in Ambush hastily arising took the Citie void of Defendants: By this wile he obtained many places, and so prosecuted his Atcheivements, that the Carthaginian armies had no abiding place either in Sardinia or Corfica. For which cause, at his Return there was no doubt made, but a most ample Triumph decreed him, which he made over the Carthaginians, Sardinia and Corfica the fifth of the Ides of March, having brought great store of plunder out of those Islands and many thousands of Captives. But in Sicily C. Florus besieged Mysistratus, which was attempted in vain, neither could it be gained till the new Consul A. Atilius A.F.C.N. came thither; For to him was allotted Sicily for his Province, the Navy was committed to his Colleague C. Salpistius Q. F. Q. N. Patreulius. They understanding that Panormus was the Carthaginians winter Quarter, marched thither with all their Forces, and, ordering their Men, presented Battel to the Enemy, but no man coming out against them, they went thence to Hippana, which Citie in their journey they stormed and presently mastered. Thence Atilius marched to Mysistratus, which being stoutly defended, at length the Garrison souldiers, being wearied with the cries and Lamentations of women and Children, forsook it. The Carthaginians went out in the night time, at break of day the Townsmen opened the Gates. But the Romans bearing too much in mind the Inconmodities they had endured in the siege thereof, slew every one they met without distinction of age or sex, till A. Atilius the Consul caused proclamation to be made, That both Plunder and Prisoners should belong to those who took them. Then at length Covetousness overcame Cruelty, and the rest of the Citizens were saved and made Captive: The Citie was plundered and demolished. The Army being thence led towards Camarina, fell into very great danger, for want of knowledge in the Country. For the Carthaginian General meeting them had first possessed the higher places, and as it were besieged the Romans rashly entred into a disadvantageous battle, ~~they~~ thought they saw before their Eyes the very picture of the Canine overthrow, but the wisdom and Valour of M. Calpurnius Pannus a Colonell in the army, in their utmost point of dispaire did releive them. For he following the Example of P. Decius, who being a Colonell in Samnum had done the like, taking three hundred souldiers along with him, went up to possess a certaine Hillock, not out of hope to escape, but both he and his souldiers being animated with the Love of honour, and desire of saving the whole army. His said when he had brought them thither, he thus spake unto them, Let us die, fellow Souldiers, and by our death deliver the Legions now round besieged. And so it came to passe, for while the enemy converted themselves wholly upon these men, they being resolved to die, did so long maintain a sharp fight with the greater number, that the Consul had time to explicate himself out of that unhappy place. The Carthaginians having slain those who did indeed on purpose offer up themselves (putting no hope in their ambush which was now discovered) departed. The fortune of Calpurnius was next to a Miracle, for he being found among the heaps of his own and the enemies dead bodies, was the only man had breath left in him; and being carried away and daintly fomented (among many wounds having not one mortal) he recovered, and afterward did great and faithful service to the Commonwealth, and proved of great terror to the enemy. If he had among the Grecians performed such a deed of Valor, they would not have known how to have bestowed rewards, or have decreed Monuments enough to his Honor: But being a Roman all the reward of such an exploit was a Garland made of Grass; nay, they were so negligent in the memory of the very Fact, that the name of this valiant man is scarcely known: Most Authors call him Calpurnius, but M. Cato calls him Q. Ceditius; Claudius Quadrigarius gives him the name of Liberius. But the Consul being freed from those straits he was in, made his error an argument of shame, and his danger of watchfulness and circumspection. Therefore with the greater courage and care he proceeds to the assault of the City, and being not able to prevail against it without Engines of battery, he borrowed some of Hiero. With them he brake down the walls, and reduced Camarina into his power, the Citizens for the most part he sold for slaves. Thence he marched to Enna, and had that by treachery delivered to him; the Garrison souldiers were part of them slain by the Romans after they were entered, the rest fled away and betook themselves to places possessed by their own party. Sittana was obtained not by craft but courage, the defendants being driven back and the City stormed. Some smaller Towns in that part of Sicily made no delay, but forthwith sent messengers with promise of submission. The Consul placing Garrisons in all places convenient, marched into the Agrigentine Territories, and by treachery had the Castle Camiens delivered to him.

- Whereupon the Garrison of Erbesus being disheartened, forsook the Town. So Erbesus came again into the Romans hands. The Consull Encouraged with this success, and thinking that many of the Liparans favoured him, advanced with his Army to their City: But there he had not the like Fortune. For Hamilcar having intelligence of the Romans Design, privately entered Lipara, and diligently expected the time of Action. The Romans being ignorant of this, boldly and unawarily coming up to the walls, were by a sudden sally of the Carthaginians beaten back. Many were wounded in that Conflict, and no small number slain. In the mean time C. Sulpicius the Consull had many encounters with the Enemy in Sardinia, and all prosperous. And his mind was so erected, that he made bold to sail toward Africa.
- The Carthaginians by no means enduring any such Attempt, once more made Hannibal Admirall, who since his flight out of Sicily had continued at Carthage, along with him they sent their best Sea Commanders, with Order, To chase the Enemies Navy from their Country Shore. He puts to Sea with a resolution to fight, but a Tempest prevented the Encounter, which being very violent on both Navies, drove them against their wills into more calme places: Both Admiralls fortun'd into Sardinian Ports. There lying at Anchor, Sulpicius to draw the Carthaginians out to sea, suborned some, under pretence of Runnagates, to perswade Hannibal, that the Romans were again sailing to Africa. He being deluded by this Craft, suddenly setting sail, before he was aware, met with the Consull who in a convenient place waited for him: Many Carthaginian ships were sunk, before they knew what they were about, the Consull's stratagem being much favour'd by a Mist opportunely arising: At length understanding what was the matter, the other ships went some back into the Haven, others drove themselves on shore, where the men landing themselves, most of the Vessels were taken empty: Hannibal despairing to recover the Port, betook himself to Salei, where, in a sedition, being apprehended by the Carthaginians, who had fled out of the same fight, he was by them Crucified, saying, that his Folly and Rashness was the cause of their Overthrow. But this Victory of the Romans was an occasion of some loss to them afterwards. For being freed from fear of the Carthaginian Navy, while they boldly and securely wasted the Grounds, they were suddenly routed by an unexpected incursion of Sardinians and Carthaginians, one Hanno being Commander. C. Duilius was this year Cenfour, and built the Temple of Janus in the Herb-Market. After this two Triumphs were made, the one of C. Aquilius Flurns Pro-consull over the Carthaginians, the fourth of the Nones of October, the other of C. Sulpicius the Consull over the Carthaginians and Sardinians, the third of the Nones. When C. Atilius M. F. M. N. Regulus, and Cn. Cornelius, L. F. Cn. N. Blasius were Consuls, the Senate ordered sacrifices to be made for avoiding the Omen of some Prodiges. In the Alban Mount, and other places, and in the City it selfe many stones fell as Haile; 'Twas thought fit to Solemnize the Latine Festivall, and in order to that, a Dictatour was created, Q. Ogulnius, L. F. A. N. Gallus. The Master of Horse was M. Lurcius, M. F. M. N. Plancianus, C. Atilius, the Admirall having sailed to Tyndaris in Sicily, when he espied the Carthaginian Navy passing by, out of order, suddenly resolved to set upon it; And commanding the other ships to follow, hastily sets forward with ten, which were Ready, and with all speed both of sail and Oare endeavours to overtake the Carthaginians, still before him. Hamilcar, a very considerable Commander, was in that Fleet, who seeing but few ships meet him, others scarce yet out of the Haven, the greater part still at Anchor, steering back, circumvented Atilius and his ships with his whole Navy, nine of them he sunk presently, not able to maintain fight with so great a Number. The Admirals Frigate being better manned, and the Mariners encouraged by the presence of the Consull, brake out from amongst them by main strength and saved it selfe. For the other Roman Vessells were now come up, by whose help the Fortune of the Battell was changed. Eight of the Carthaginian ships were sunk, ten with all their men taken; the rest steered to the Liparan Islands. These things were done at Sea. The Land Forces were not so quick at their Work, having in vain assaulted the City Lipara: But with all hostility they spoiled the open Fields; the same Calamity also attended the Island Melita, not farre distant. For these Exploits C. Atilius the Consull made a Navall Triumph over the Carthaginians. The same year A. Atilius the Pro-Consull Triumphed over the Carthaginians of Sicily the fourteenth of the Calends of February. The Romans were then in a very joyfull state and Condition, being Victours not onely at Land, but at sea also; And did now begin to Consult not onely of the Conquest of Sicily and the Neighbouring Islands, which they thought sure enough their own, but of invading Africa also, and bring the Terror of the War to the Gates of Carthage it selfe.

B O O K V I I I.

Afterwards L. Manlius, A. F. P. N. commonly called Longus, did enter upon the Consulship, and L. Cæcilius, Q. F. Q. N. after whose death, M. Atilius, M. F. L. N. Regulus, who had been sometimes Consul, succeeded in his Office. Then onely in this year Africa, which hitherto had been free from any miseries by an Enemy, began to be sensible of a war, when the Romans had made an invasion therein, after they had in a great Sea-fight gained the Victory over the Carthaginians fleet; which actions, as they were achieved, we shall in this Book set forth, and both the one and the other fortune of that same Regulus; and this end not suitable to the gallantry of the man; The year before when the Carthaginians, C. Atilius being Consul, did so strive to get the best in a Sea-conflict, that when they had lost many ships, they first gave over fighting; yet because they had sunk some certain of the Roman Vessels, they would not take themselves to have been of lesser reputation; On the other part, the Romans did judge that event as an undoubted Victory. So it was that the vast multitude on both sides did bend their mindes with greatest emulation to the study of Sea-Affaires. And therefore the Consuls being charged to remove the warre into Africa, when they were come to Messana, with an Armado of three hundred and thirty ships, and from thence passing by the Coast of Sicily on the right hand beyond Pachinus, to take in the Foot Forces, they having also some Forts near the Hill Ecnomus, they sailed forward. And about the same time Hamilcar General of the Carthaginians, and Hanno the Admirall, being Commanders of a Fleet of three hundred and sixty ships, having passed by Lilybaum in Carthage, and then Heraclæa Minoa, in that bay they consult of casting Anchor, observing the motions of the Romans, and if they durst bend towards Africa, they were in a posture to stop their course; which when the Consuls were informed of, they with good advice make all things ready for either chance; that they might not be to seek for Counsell, whether they were to engage in a Sea-conflict, or to draw some whither for safety: therefore committing the ships to some of the stoutest Souldiers, they make four Squadrons, as so many parts of the whole fleet; the choicest men they set in the first Squadron, the two next Squadrons they place in their order, in the Reare-guard they put their chiefeest men for strength, the Triarii, these forces they dispose of in such array, that each ship did carry 300 rowers, and six score Souldiers. So the Muster-Roll in the whole Navy did amount to an hundred and forty thousand men.

Polyb. 1. 23.
Orosius 4. 8.
Polyb.

The Carthaginians did somewhat exceed that number, leading more souldiers then an hundred and fifty thousand. And indeed the Consuls did scarce esteem of any other sort of souldiers in comparison of their own. There was so much the more consulting, when it did appear, they must needs fight in the deep Ocean; where the swiftnes of the ships, and the skill of the Pilots are of much advantage, to the fit ordering the front of the battell-array against that danger; finally they consider of placing the whole Fleet aright. They set two Gallies wherein the Consuls themselves were carried, very even in the Van, to both those Gallies they joyn on this side the first Squadron, on that side the second in a long continued row; the ships being placed in such manner, that the fore castles of them all were turned outwards, and the Gallies did move almost joyned together, the ships next to those did keep from each other more apart, and so consequently the space left between the opposite ships did grow wider according to their being set in order. So when the form of the Van in manner of a wedge was shaped, with small distance between the first ships, and with great spaces between the last, then did they cause the third Squadron to advance, which bearing that open space between the two first ships, did meely by their order, exhibit a triangular form of the whole array; behind this, at the third Squadrons back, the long boats were drawn by a Barge with Cables to pull with, reaching to the ships of the Tersian souldiers. The Triarii the souldiers set in the Rear-ward, did so environ the former, the ships being stretched out into a halfe circle, that from each Wing they did appear; So the whole body with a deep hollow front, the hindmost parts being firmly solid, did resemble the snout of a ship, not less able to receive a violent assault, then fit to give one.

But the Carthaginian Captains having intelligence by their Scouts of the approach of the Roman fleet, when they considered, the passage to their City was not difficult, the common sort were nothing manly, the bordering Neighbours inconstant, and very prone to fall from their fidelity, they conclude to go out to meet them: being resolved first to try all that might be, rather then they would suffer, that the Roman Vessels should have a safe Voyage into Africa. Therefore they betake them to their ships, incouraging their men in short, That they would undertake the fight with mindes firmly bent and chearfull, well remembering they were to fight, not only touching things present, but in reference to all things, which each one held precious at home; and with their own good hope, and that of their fellow Seamen, they launch forth out of the Harbour; nor was the Romans fleet far distant, therefore not far from Herculea they give the shock against each other with equall stoutness; The Carthaginian Captains did so provide, that Hanno should charge on the Right Wing, (but it was he that had been unfortunate at Agrigentum) Hamilcar should be Commander over the rest. And they also divide their ships into four Squadrons, having observed the array which the Romans had made use of; Of these, that which was the left Wing of the whole array being crooked like a bow, did make towards the shore, the rest were extended in their plain order, and turned upon the first Squadron of the Enemies ships. Hereupon the Right Wing in which there were very swift Vessels with snouts and five oares in a seat, Hanno did stretch it out all he could towards the main Ocean, being ready to surround the Enemy, if the skirmish should begin at any other part. And the Consuls not staying long did venture themselves with their two Squadrons into the midst of the Carthaginian ships; Hamilcar that he might break the array of the Romans did charge his souldiers, when the Conflict began, they should presently take their flight, which being done, and the Romans only pursuing them, the Carthaginians indeed had no hurt by their flying, in regard their ships were swift: but the array of the Romans, as Hamilcar wished, and had foreseen, was rent asunder, when yet the Triarii, and the third Squadron did keep their places, which, when he saw it performed, he suddenly gives a sign out of his own ship, that their fore-castles being turn'd, they should encounter those that did pursue them: the fight was doubtfull, the Carthaginians excelling in swiftness, and in skill for Navigation. The Romans being farre transcendant in the stoutness of their souldiers; Therefore so long as the fight rather of the ships, then of the men, did last, the Carthaginians had the better clearly: But when they began to fight hand to hand, the ships being fastned close with grappling irons, then the Victory did certainly incline towards the Roman party: When the souldier full of confidence through his hand-strokes, and fighting before the Consuls, did strive to approve his valour to them with a more notable endeavour: while the skirmish was so managed in that part, Hanno with the Right Wing, which hitherto he kept unmov'd, made a fierce assault, being carried by the tide amongst the ships of the Triarii, and did create them much troublesome work, when they were brought to great distress; At the same time almost, the Left Wing also of the Carthaginians, the first posture being changed, and with a front made even, does assail with dangerous beaks the third Squadron of the Romans, which drew their long boats by a Barge. The Romans having slipt their Cables, did prepare themselves for resistance; Here also they shew much Gallantry: So in three places, there do happen even just so many Sea-fights, far distant from each other.

When they had fought so hard, the Victory long enough inclining to either side, at last it changed, as needs it must, where there is fierce bickering in sundry places at once, with equall force and vehemency, that the selfe-same part which is first routed, should cause the whole Victory. For when Hamilcar was utterly unable any longer to withstand the Violence of his Enemies, his single flight did immediately disperse even the whole fleet of the Carthaginian. For L. Manlius one of the Consuls, being very much busied about bringing together the ships that were taken, and chaining them to his own, M. Regulus espying the fight to begin afresh in another place, he made halte to relieve his own side, taking to him the ships of the second Squadron, all that escaped out of the former fight safe and unshattered; The Triarii did soon perceive that relieve, and recollecting their Spirits, which had even failed them in extremity of Danger, they began to oppose their Enemies with great undauntedness. Hanno, when he saw that both those before him made stout resistance, and that himselfe was so over-charged on the Reare with fresh supplies, hoisting up sail he did his best to avoid his approaching overthrow. And when L. Man- lius amidst these tryalls beheld the third Squadron of the Romans to be enforced towards land by the Carthaginians Left Wing, he steer'd that way, and M. Regulus overtook him unawares, who had even now set the long boats and the Triarii out of harmes reach. So the state of things is soon quite changed, and they are surrounded very close, who but just before had hemmed the Romans in. Whom indeed being strangely encompassed, and in a manner straightly besieged, they might e're this have utterly destroyed, unless not daring to go near them for fear of the iron raven-beaks they were wont to grapple with, they gave the Consuls time enough, that themselves being safe they might even secure their own side, and the Carthaginians, that were environ'd by a sudden surprizeall, had leisure to take, as with a net, fifty ships, and all that were therein, so the other few stealing away by the very shore side did make their escape.

This Sea-conflict as well in regard of various ill accidents, and the eagerness of the encounter, as also for the number of ships lost on both sides, was of fair remark. Of the Carthaginian ships sixty and three were taken, above thirty were sunk. The Conquering Romans lost four and twenty by reason of foul weather, but not one of them did fall into the hands of the Enemy. Orosius 4.3

When this victory was over, returning to Messana they allotted certaine daies to mend their ships, and refresh their men, and to take in store of new provision. Amongst which, Hamilcar when he would not yeild by any means, the Romans should go to Africa, but wanted strength to stop their march, he betook himself to stratagems, and sought, by sending Hanno to them to sue for peace, to prolong the time, till the arrivall of the forces which he lookt the Carthaginians would send him. Hanno when he made his addresse to the Consuls, and heard the exclamations of the people, that the same decree ought to pass against him, which five years before the Carthaginians had design'd against Cornelius Asina then Consul, he shifted off the threatned mischief with a subtill answer, Verily if ye shall do so (saies he) ye shall not be better at all then the very Africans; and presently the Consuls well resenting what he said, commanding those to be silent that had voted him to chains, and there was a voice heard well becomming the gravity of the Roman stock, O Hanno, the faithful dealing of our City does quit thee from that fear. It was in vain to move for peace because the Carthaginian did not deal sincerely, and the Consuls did rather aim at Victory then at Peace. Therefore they had no mind to defer any longer their intended voyage to Africa; Neither did the Carthaginian Commanders crosse the design, though they engaged to each other, not to endure the enemy should march without disturbance, but to infect him from sundry quarters, and to bar his passage. But Hanno making hast to Carthage beforehand, Hamilcar not daring to attempt ought, carries at Heraclea. The Romans ships made a safe voyage free both from enemies and from tempests. And there wanted not some that did strangely abominate any travelling far by sea, and the enemies coast, and the very name of Africa. Mannius, an Officer among the souldiers, did first begin to speak ill of government, but Regulus was so incensed against him, that he threatned him that scourges and the axe should be his lot, unless he would submit. So at length the Consul was obeyed, and the nearer and the greater fear did expel the dread of travelling by sea. The Promontory is called Hermann which from the bosome of Carthage does stretch very far into the Sicilian sea. That coast was first found out by the Roman ships, then after a little stay while the whole fleet came up together, the Consuls having passed by the coast of Africa, they arrived at the Citie Clupea. Here the souldiers are exposed to hazard, and when the ships were put into harbor, there was a Trench drawn round for the more security. The Citie because it refused to surrender, was besieged, and presently through the timorousnesse of the Citizens it being either yielded or deserted (for 'tis reported either way) it was reduced to the obedience of the Romans. But the Carthaginians though they did endure things truly harsh, and very strange, yet they rejoiced at their weal, that they fared somewhat better then they expected: for when they heard what issue the Sea-fight had, they were sore afraid, least presently the conquering forces would have been drawn even against Carthage it self. Therefore re-assuming some courage after their former fright, they were fully bent to make what strength they could to defend their City and the Suburbs thereof. Mean while the Consuls having sent messengers to Rome which would acquaint the Senators what exploits had been achieved already, and should beseech their advice touching new attempts, they make Clupea a Garrison, that they might make use of that seat of war. And having set a guard to defend the City and field adjoyning, they marching a great way forward with all their other forces, they utterly waste a very fruitful Country, which from the dayes of Ayabuctus had not seen the sword of an enemy; they destroy many goodly Villages, they force away whole droves of cattel, moreover they lead away by force above twenty thousand men, no man daring to gainsay; they also take many Towns by storm or by surrender, wherein they apprehend several Revolters, and set free many Roman Captives, that were taken in the late wars, amongst whom I believe even Cn. Cornelius to have been, that was chosen Consul again after two years were expired. While things are thus acted, they that were sent to Rome by the Consuls, return with Orders from the Senate. One of them was commanded to quarter in Africa, with such considerable forces as they held needful to be kept there. The other was required to bring back the rest of the fleet, and the residue of the army Zonaras

- to Rome. So Winter now drawing near, M. Regulus continued there with almost fifteen thousand foot, five hundred horsemen, and with forty ships, what remained of the Fleet being richly laden with Captives, and other booty L. Manlius having safely passed by the Coasts of Sicily, he carried back to Rome. I find he led along with him to Rome twenty seven thousand Captives, and the Navall Triumph over the Carthaginians was ordain'd for him. Afterwards Ser. Fulvius, M. F. M. N. Patinus the more noble, and M. Aemilius, M. F. L. N. Paulus were made Consuls.
- The Government of Sicily and the Command of the Fleet are committed to the charge of those two: They were not minded to call back Regulus from amidst his Victories, while he went on prosperously in Africa; and he was ordered by the Proconsul to manage the War there: That decree of the Senate no one did worse resent, than he himselfe, for whose honour it was made. Therefore in his Letters to the Senate he made that his grievance, and set it as the main ground of his suit, that another might succeed him in his Office, upon the death of his Bailiffe (he undertook to manure a piece of ground of seven Acres, which his Master had in Pupinia) having gained an opportunity, he thence delivered up his Commission, and left his charge, wherefore he must needs depart, least in his absence, when his ground lay untill'd, his wife and children should want bread. And the Senate did ordain, that M. Regulus his ground should be dressed at the Publick charge, that what damage he had sustained should be made good, and fair provision should be made for his wife and children. Such good orders were then in use! But when I read of or relate these things and the like, I cannot chuse but recollect with my self, which is the more lasting recompence for virtue, a reward by Coin, or by commendation; by pounds, or by praise. M. Regulus his renowne does endure many ages after his death; the wealth of others hath perisht with their Masters, and oftentimes before them: In the mean season the Carthaginians having chosen two Generalls at home, Asdrubal, Hanno's sonne, and Bostar; they sent also for Hamilcar their third Commander in chief to come out of Sicily. Who with five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse came in all haste from Heraclea to Carthage. These having called a Councell do decree, that the Army should not be kept within Walls, as the manner heretofore had been, neither should the Roman souldiers be permitted to do what they list'd without any punishment. So when they were encouraged to wage War, the Army was drawn out.
- In the mean time M. Regulus did march to all places near adjoining, through which the River Bagrada does slide, subduing all before him, not far from which the Romans that held certain Castles, were smitten with a sudden pestilence, and lost many, and were fore amazed. A water-Serpent of huge bigness did set upon the souldiers, and they being much affrighted, and resisting all in vain, the Serpent did swallow down many of them with his wide yawning jawes, others he bruised to pieces with his furious windings, and with the strokes of his tail, some again he poysoned to death with the blasting of his pestiferous breath, and he made so much ado for M. Regulus, that with all his forces he must fight with the Serpent for the possession of the River, which when it was done with the loss of many souldiers, and the Dragon could neither be overcome, nor wounded, he with his extream hard crust of Scales easily repelling, what ever darts they did throw at him, they must make use of Engines, and without great Guns and Mortar-pieces, like a well fenced Tower, the Enemy is not to be overthrown; After severall hurlings that were made in vain, a great stone being cast, did break his back-bone all to shivers, and did dissolve the vigorous violence of the formidable Monster. And the business was effected with so much difficulty, and with so great terrour to Horse and Foot, that the souldiers did averre they had rather oppose Carthage it selfe, then such another Monster. And the Camp could stay there no longer, but must shun the infected waters, and all the Country round about, which was blasted with the contagious stink of his lying there. This was some shame to the pride of men, which are wont to think very fondly, that they can Conquer all things. Truly when M. Regulus was Generall, that had been Conquerour by Sea and Land, one single Serpent when he was alive, did hold the whole Roman Army in plea, and being killed, he made the Army draw off. And therefore the Proconsull did hold it no immodesty to send the spoils even of this very Enemy to Rome, and to acknowledge with a publick Monument the greatness of his own fear, and his rejoycing at the victory. For he took order the skin of the beast should be taken off and carried to Rome, which is reported to have been an hundred and twenty foot long, and being hanged up in a certain Temple to have lasted even till the Wars at Numantia. When the Camp was remov'd from Bagrada, the Consull commanded the Army towards the City Adis, all Towns and Castles being won and demolisht that lay in their road.
- But to Adis, which was hard to take, there was a certain way of laying siege by the help of warlike engines. To the crossing of which, when the Carthaginian Captains did speedily make haste they fate down on a certain hill, but full of wood and full of other impediments that was very near the Roman Camp. M. Regulus having well considered the nature of the place, and what manner of enemies he had to deale with, when he saw their foot were not comparable to his, but that they put much confidence in their Elephants and horsemen, but such forces being very formidable in open fields by the inequality of the places would not be come at, and would be made very useles; he wisely taking some advantage by the folly of his enemies, before they could perceive and correct their error, determines to fall upon them in their own Tents. Wherefore fore encouraging his souldiers, and diligently observing what reason did suggest, he goes out of his Camp before the dawning of the day, and does cause his army to advance towards the hill directly opposite, where the Carthaginians had pitcht their Tents. First of all, the audacious confidence of the Romans did even amaze the Carthaginians, which being far lesse in number did set upon such a vast army even in their own trenches, from a low place, and of great disadvantage. Then they were in the greater confusion even in this respect, because the horsemen and Elephants, from which they did hope for most assistance, were not only of no advantage, but did extremely hinder and disturb them, and the very time did augment their trembling, that the Romans did set upon them unawares, and most of them, as yet, being fast asleep, therefore many of them are put to the sword even in their huts, the others stragling in their amazed flight, and not knowing where to hide themselves, were taken by parties set on purpose to way-lay them.

Nevertheless the Carthaginians Mercenary souldiers, the Spainards and the French, being instantly in a good posture, and fighting Couragiously on the other side of their bulwark it was doubtful a great while which would get the upper hand. The forlorn hope even now being put to the run, the whole Roman army had been overthron, if the horse from another quarter that were commanded to wheele about had not in the very nick of time charged the enemy on the reare that were pursuing those which fled. Then they also which a little before had deserted their station might now be rallied up and encouraged to fight afresh. So the enemy being set upon on both sides, when he had for a long time with much gallantry made resistance, he was constrained to cry quarter. When the Carthaginians saw what was done, immediately they fling themselves out of their Scences, and fall to running with all the speed they could make, and indeed the Elephants and the horsemen when once they came into plaines they could retreat well enough and safely too. The Conquerors having pursued the infantry somewhat far, they turn back at length to throw down their fortifications. In this Battel there were seventeen thousand of the Carthaginians that were slain, five thousand are reported to be taken prisoners, and eighteen Elephants. The successe of this battel did purchase the Romans much friendship not only from all the Countreyes round about, but even from people that were most remote. And in few dayes about fourscore walled towns vowed fidelity to the Romans. Whereas upon the newes that Tunis such a fenced City was taken by Regulus, did even astonish the Carthaginians that were greatly straitned before, and which was built twelve miles from Carthage, least it suffer what ever they did there to be kept secret from the enemy, then being a fair prospect both to the very City it selfe, and to the sea hard by.

And the terrible dead of their war with the Romans did not only dance round the Carthaginians, but the Numidians also, out of an old grudge being stirred up by a fresh opportunity took up arms, and by spoiling and firing the Carthaginian towns, brought more terror and misery upon them, then the Romans did. And the Boores from all parts flying for refuge to the City, did cause not only a huge dread, but also a great dearth, when such a multitude of people did devour a world of provision, and the avarice of the owners did conceale the plenty as yet in store, who gaping greedily for gain by that Common Calamity were full of hope the price of victuals would raise daily according to the decrease of their most necessary food. Whereupon it followed, the Embassy of Marcus Regulus was hearken'd to with greater heed, who aiming at the honor of finishing the war, and fearing least some one that might succeed him with a new commission from Rome should prevent him, he moves the Carthaginians to Conditions for peace. To that purpose some of the prime Senators are sent unto him, but when they saw strange harsh conditions offer'd, and their businesse at a stand, they took their leave of M. Regulus, who was verily perswaded he had Victory by the hand. Sicily forsooth, and all Sardinia were commanded to yeeld, to send freely home what Romans they had taken, to ransom their own men, to bear the whole charge of the war, and to pay besides a pension by the year. They had other impositions, full as burthenesome as these. That they should be confederates with the Romans for offence and defense, that they should use but one great ship. But the Romans they should assist with fifty gallyes well appointed as oft as they should be required. The Embassadors being transported with wonder at such Articles, and that Regulus might grant his vanquishd suppliants more milde conditions, he made this answer, Men must either Conquer or crutch to those that subdue them. By the return of which words the Carthaginians were much incensed, though they had often made suite for peace, yet they are fully bent, rather to endure the worst that could happen than to embrace those Conditions, which they held no other than the bondage and servitude of their Citie.

In that state of affairs certain ships which were sent to waite some souldiers into Greece, did return when they had gathered up no small body of Mercenary souldiers; Among these there was one Xanthippus, by race a Lacedemonian, who did couple the noble exercise of warfare with the discipline of his Country, wherein he had been well trained up from his youth. He sufficiently understanding what feats had been done already, and having insight enough into the other furniture of the Carthaginian forces, of the Elephants and Horsemen, he made bold to speak a proud word openly, that the Carthaginians were not subdued by the Romans, but by themselves, by the weakness of their Commanders, that knew not the duty of their places. This rumor being soon dispers'd, when Xanthippus was call'd before the Magistrates, he does produce such evident reasons of that his judgement, that scarce ought could be more manifest; he shews them that in all their expeditions, in making their Fort, in joyning Battell, it was their manner still to pick out places utterly unfit, if they would listen to his advice, he does assure them not onely of safety, but also of Victory. When severall of the Chief Citizens do approve of his judgement, and the very Commanders also themselves, and with becoming modesty preferring the welfare of their Country before his single opinion, they agree and ordain that the guidance of his Army should be committed to a foreigner. Xanthippus having undertook his charge, daily drawing his souldiers out of the City, he does accustom the field Forces to observe and change their ranks, and instantly to do what they are commanded, and the confidence of better success does fill the souldiers with admiration of him; the whole City being cherished even in desperation, is raised up to expect joyfull things to come. When the Commanders behold this Universal Cheerfulness, they also taking heart thereby, resolve to give the Enemy another charge, and encouraging their souldiers, as opportunity did require, they march out against the Romans, even with almost twelve thousand Foot with four hundred horse, and well high as many Elephants; that thing alone did perplex the Romans, that they saw the Carthaginians make their inroads through the plain fields, having changed their first design, avoiding all steep and craggy places: But being puffed up with pride through their constant felicity, they let at nought the souldiers that were wont to vanquish, and Grossus their Leader. And Regulus was not corrupted with that sawning poison of fortune waiting on him. When he well considered that he had routed the Sea Forces of the Carthaginians, and the foot Souldiers too, that he had taken almost two hundred Townes, two hundred thousand men, and that Carthage being sore straitened, might be enforced to surrender, he denied them peace when they sued for it on reasonable termes, and wrote to Rome, That the very Gates of Carthage which he had begun did tremble at him. So also moderation hath oftner deserted great Spirits in prosperity, then constancy in adversity. But the Carthaginians having pitched their tents in a plain field, M. Regulus whose chiefest strength was in his infantry, and thither he could not be followed but over Mountainous and steep difficult places, thinking it all odds to his Valour where he fought, he was not afraid to trust himself in the Camp, even to the greater vantage of his confidence, passing over the river that was in the midst, and distant from the Enemy even two hundred thousand paces. Xanthippus perceiving the indiscretion of the Roman Leader, did avouch this would be the very time, wherein he would performe what he had promised the Carthaginians, for he had got the Romans even tired with long Marching, where his heart could wish them; he nothing doubted the Victory would be certainly his own; the time also did seem most commodious for the fight, because the day now drawing towards the evening, the Africans knowing well all places thereabout, if they should be overcome, they might escape better in the night, or if they should conquer, the night would not hinder the pursuit of the Victory. Therefore the Carthaginians consulting what was to be done, Xanthippus calling for the help of Gods and Men, that they might not lose such a singular opportunity, he did earnestly perswade his men to undertake the Battell so much the easier, because the souldiers themselves crying out to Xanthippus, they did of their own accord with universal cheerfulness desire to encounter with the Enemy, therefore the charge of the main affair is granted to the Spartan, he draws out the Army, and does exercise them after this manner. A four square body of 8000 Carthaginians, which were the prime Chosen men of all their foot, was set for a reserve; before this body, a convenient space being left between, the Elephants are set in order, being drawn up as broad as that square body, on either Wing the Horse are placed, behind these on the Right Wing stands the main body of hired souldiers. The Army being set in such array, he commanded the skirmishers, that having thrown their darts, they should stand in open order for the advantage of their own side, and when their main body should joyn with the Enemy, they should violently break out again from the Wings, and should on a sudden furiously flank the Romans, when they were charging the opposite reserve. On the contrary part Regulus having well drawn up his Army, when he saw the Elephants in the Front of the Carthaginians, he soon takes advice, he brings his souldiers lightly armed to the Van, he sets the well Compact foot Companies in the Reserve, the Horse are drawn up in the Wings, the Army is firme in respect of depth, but much narrower then before; so that the chief danger being feared from the Enemies Elephants and Horsemen, they did indeed take a right course against the Elephants, but being in an open and Champaign Country, there was room sufficient for the Horse to surround the whole Army being so close compacted. The Fight was begun by the Elephants, which Xanthippus commanded to be led against the opposite Regiments, and the Romans making a great shout set forward to meet them. The Horse were likewise engaged in both Wings, but there the Romans being much inferiour in Number, and not able to resist the Enemies charge, fled away. But the Foot which were of the Left Wing, (whether it were to avoid the Elephants, or that thereby they thought the more easily to obtain the Victory) charged the Mercenaries, and putting them to flight, pursued them to their very Camp. The rest of the foot had an harder taske against the Elephants, by whose vast bodies their ranks were disordered, themselves trodden under foot, and whole Companies like a falling house, struck down to the ground, yet the very thickness of the Battell hindered them from breaking through; till at last they were distressed on all parts, for the Flanks and Rear were galled by the Horse, the foremost who made a shift to break through the Elephants, were slain by the Enemy.

Enemy standing yet Entire, and the light-armed men flying in upon them. There was no less execution done in the Flight, the Elephants and Numidian Horse pursuing them in an open plain place. Regulus with almost five hundred souldiers was taken alive by the Enemy; of the whole Army there escaped but about two thousand (who had charged and put to flight the Mercenaries) who beyond all Hope, by their halt, got safe into Clupea; of the Romans and their Associates were slain about thirty thousand. Of the Carthaginians there were not many wanting beside eight hundred of the Mercenaries, who had fought against the Left Wing of the Enemy. When the Army returned to Carthage after so great a Victory, carrying the Roman Generall Prisoner, a multitude of Citizens came out to meet them, others standing in the streets, or in their houses, beheld the spectacle with wonderfull Pleasure, which they durst lately scarce hope for; their mindes being not capable to believe so great an Happiness attending them; nor being of late so near despair, giving not onely their Country, but very City for lost, they durst scarce believe so great a Change, though they saw it with their eyes: But they took most speciall notice of the Generalls, every ones eye and thought being settled on them, looking sometimes on Xanthippus, sometimes on Regulus, Extolling the greatness of their own Commander, by the Estimation they had of the other. He must of necessity be a gallant Man who hath overcome so stout a Generall, so fortunate a Warriour, a proud Conquerour, an implacable Enemy, the Terror and Plague of Carthage, now of a sudden bereaved of a numerous Army, having lost his ancient Fame and Liberty together. Their Admiration was encreased by the habit and Garbe of the Man, who under a small body, and none of the best lookes, carried a large and virtuous mind. For this Exploit Xanthippus had much glory, and withall as much envy, to avoid which he used as much art as in finishing the Warre, for whereas he might justly expect an everlasting reward of his good service at Carthage, yet he resolved to leave those doubtful hopes and full of Treachery, and return home, before other mens affections, or his own fortune were altered. For this is for the most part the disposition of men, that openly they profess the love of their Country, but really study their own private good; as long as their City being in safety, they can obtain and quietly enjoy Honour and Riches, they pretend mighty love to their Country: But where there is danger lest they should bestow the same benefits on others for their egregious merits, they had rather want a man who doeth good to the Common-wealth, then have him in the least way hinder their private commodity: As long as they think themselves able to equall others, their envy is hidden and more remis; but when they see themselves farre exceeded, and that Honour duly given to others which they desired for themselves, then what they were not able by virtue to obtain, they seek it by Calumnies and Criminations. So that the best men have ordinarily most Enemies and are most subject to Treachery; But a Native of the Country hath some remedy against this Evill in his Friends and kindred: A stranger being voide of all helpe and assistance encreaseth the malice of degenerate mindes by his being easy to be hurt, in that he is more exposed to Treasons, and may without any great labour or danger be offended, affronted and undone. That Xanthippus apprehended and considered these things, the sequel doth evidently demonstrate, 'Tis reported he was drowned by some sent after him from the Carthaginians, who after so great a benefit received, hated the Author of it, who being once dead, they thought it would quickly be forgot that their Countrey was preserved by a Foreigner.

Others deny Xanthippus thus to have perished, yet confesse the Treachery of the Carthaginians, who at his Departure allotted him an old ship, full of Leakes, fairly pitcht over as if it had been sound, but that he discovering the Cheat, went aboard on another ship and escaped the danger. About the same time they committed another fact of no less Treachery, but much more cruell, by reason of the number that perished thereby. The Mercenariys in somewhat a tumultuous manner claiming a Reward of their paines taken, and happy Valour, were put into ships being made believe that in some other place they should have their Desire: But the Captains of the ships who had such private Order, landed them and left them in a Barren Island, where being destitute of all helpe from man, without food, without ships, having famine on one side, and the Sea on the other, they pined away and perished; a fowl and horrid kind of Death. Others referre this Fact to former times, when there was warre between the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and that the Island was thereupon called Offides, or the Bonie Island, it lieth in the main Sea beyond Lipara Westward. These deeds whensoever and howsoever performed, do nothing disagree with the Carthaginians usuall Cruelty. And if thus they served their Friends and Associates, it is no wonder, they were more then ordinarily severe against their Enemies. Other Prisoners indeed were somewhat tolerably well used, for they likewise had many Captives at Rome, for whom they intended to make an Exchange. But against M. Regulus they could neither cover nor moderate their Anger, but vexed and afflicted him all manner of wayes; they allowed him food which was neither pleasant to the Palate, nor strengthening to the Body, but which with much adoe by a stitgh nourishment served to produce his Miserable life. But more grievous were the Contumelies and Reproaches daily heaped upon him, amongst the rest, they would frequently on a sudden introduce an Elephant, to fright him with the noise and ugly shape of it, not suffering him to rest neither in Mind or body, and being thus miserably handled, and brought low, they cast him into the common Gaole.

When

When these things were heard at Rome, the City was filled not only with great grief but with fear also; for they mistrusted least the Carthaginians, provoked with the sense of their own calamities, and encouraged by this victory, should recompence them in the like kind, and dare to come even to the walls of Rome to inflict on them the same mischiefs themselves had suffered. The Senate therefore commanded the Consuls, To strengthen Italy as diligently as might be with sufficient Garrisons, themselves with a vast Navy to sail into Sicily, and thence if they thought fit into Africa, to divers the Carthaginians from any expedition into Italy. But the Carthaginians in the first place made it their care to reduce those Cities which the Romans had possessed, to punish those Africans who had revolted from them, and by strength of arms to vanquish those who persisted in rebellion. Clupea was indeed by the Romans stoutly defended, but in Numidia, and over the other Africans (though their war was great) their victory was easie.

In the mean time, understanding that a great Fleet was preparing in Italy, they left the Siege of Utica which they had commenced, trimmed up the old ships, built new ones, and studiously endeavour'd to prevent the Romans from landing on the African shore. The Consuls used such incredible diligence, that by the beginning of Summer they had three hundred and fifty ships ready fitted and laden, with which sailing to Sicily, when they found all things safe there, and no danger, but that they were full of expectations and fears, they left Garrisons where most need was, and with the rest of their army steared towards Africa. But being by a tempest forced upon Cossura (an Island between Africa and Sicily, near the Promontory of Lilybæum) they waited the grounds there, took a City of the same name, and placed a Garrison in it. Then they set forward to the Promontory of Hermæus, which being in the mid-way between Carthage and Clupea, shutteth in one side of the Carthaginian Gulf. At this place the Carthaginian Navy met them, and a very sharp fight was entred into on both sides, when help came to the Romans from Clupea, which totally inclined the victory, being before doubtful. An hundred and four of the Carthaginian ships were sunk, thirty taken, and fifteen thousand soldiers lost; on the Roman side eleven hundred men were lost, and nine ships. The fleet then sailed to Utica, where they landed their men, and pitched their Camp near the City. The Carthaginians likewise brought their forces thither under the conduct of Hanno, where in a land fight they were overcome with the loss of above nine thousand men. There were some Noble men taken prisoners, whom the Consuls reserved whereby to redeem M. Regulus and others who were in the like condition. They then consulted on present affairs, and conceived great hopes they might keep Africa in possession: Nevertheless the country round about being plunder'd and spoiled, they, fearing a famine, thought fit to return into Sicily, together with those Romans who had defended Clupea. They carried away very vast and rich spoils, which had been laid up in Clupea in the time of Regulus his prosperity, and much increased by late victories. They had a safe Voyage into Sicily, and sufficiently fortunate had been the Consuls if they would have set a bounds to their happiness. But because in their return to Italy they thought by the by to take some Port towns of Sicily, not regarding the ship-masters counsel (who advised them, Not to sail in those dangerous and rough seas against the coast of Africa, new Orion and the Dog Star were rising) they suffered such shipwrack by tempest as hath hardly been heard of, of three hundred threescore and four ships, scarce fourscore, having cast out all their lading, were saved; much about the same number of horse-boats and other sorts of vessels were lost, insomuch as the whole shore, even from the coast of Camarina (where the storm began) to Pachynus, was filled with the Corps of dead men, and horses, and pieces of broken ships. In this their hard distresse the humanity of King Hiero was no small comfort to them, who bountifully entertained them, furnishing them with cloths, and victuals, and tackling for their ships, and conducted them safe to Messana. But the Carthaginians made no delay to take advantage of this their misfortune, they presently regained the Island and City of Cossura; and forthwith crossing over into Sicily besieged Agrirentum under the command of Carbalo, and no relief coming, they took it and demolished it: A great multitude of persons were here slain and taken prisoners, the others, who escaped through the midlands into the territories of Syracuse, planted themselves in a Village near the Temple of Jupiter Olympus. Neither were they out of hopes of recovering the whole Island, but that the Romans associates confirmed and strengthened themselves against present fears, hearing what diligence was used in preparing a new Navy; for the Consuls were so intent upon the work, that with wonderful speed, in the space of three moneths, an hundred and twenty ships were built. With these Cn. Cornelius L.F. C.N. Scipio Afrina, and A. Attilius A.F. C.N. Calpurnius being Consuls again, having made a new levy of stout soldiers, were commanded with the first opportunity to set to sea. This Cn. Cornelius was a great example of the Inconstancy of Fortune, and of Patience in Adversity, for having seven years agoe, when he was Consul, been circumvented by the craft of the Carthaginians, and suffer'd captivity, imprisonment and chains, and whatsoever misery is incident to mankind, he now resumed not only the other Ornaments of his degree, but likewise the Consular Dignity with so much the more joy, by how much the sadder misfortune he had been before bereaved of them.

The Consuls having arrived at Messana, and joyned to themselves what ships they found there, being chiefly the Relicks of the last ship-wrack, sailed with two hundred and fifty ships to the mouth of the River Himera, and took by treachery the Town of Cephalædium, some eighteen miles distant upon the same shore: From Lipæanum (for thither they had steered their course) they departed without effecting their purpose, being not able to take it on the sudden, and Carthago having sent thither supplies in case of a siege. Being not thereby discouraged from farther attempts, they happily accomplished another design of greater moment. They directed their course to Panormus, the principal City of the Carthaginians jurisdiction, and possessing the Haven, fate down under the very Walls, and the Panormitans refusing to yield, they encompassed the City with a Ditch and Bulwark. The nature of the ground favour'd their intendments, yielding plenty of materials and wood for their works, which being finished, they began the assault, and battered down with their Engines a Tower by the sea side, and the souldiers entring by the breach, with great slaughter of the enemy, took the outward City, which was called New Panormus; the old City did not long hold out, for a great number flying thither out of the new City, bringing along with them more terror then provisions, they were dejected with consideration of their present danger, and fearing sudden scarcity, sent messengers to the Consuls with proposals to yield up all but their bodies; the Consuls knowing the wants of the besieged, accepted not the conditions unless they would redeem themselves at a certain price. Every head was valued at two Mina, fourteen thousand persons were ransomed, the rest, being thirteen thousand were sold together with the plunder. This Victory was very glorious, of great and sudden concernment, for hereupon many Towns on that coast, some also far distant, cast out the Carthaginian Garrisons and submitted themselves to the Romans. The Jetines began, and their example was followed by the Soluntines, Petrinæ, Tyndaritans and others. Affairs being thus transacted, and a Garrison left at Panormus, the Consul returned to Messana and so to Rome. The Carthaginians lying in wait for them at their return, surpris'd some ships of Burthen with money in them.

At Rome there was two Naval Triumphs made immediately one after another, by the former year Consuls (whose command was prorogued) over the Corsicans and Carthaginians; Serv. Fulvius triumphed the thirteenth of the Calends of February, and M. Aemilius the day after. The five hundredth year after the foundation of the City a fruitless expedition was made into Africa. Cn. Servilius Cn. F. (n. N. Capio), and Cn. Sempronius Ti. F. Ti. N. Blasus being Consuls, crossed over into Sicily, where having in vain attempted Lilybaeum, they directed their course to Africk with two hundred and threescore ships, and sailing along the coast and sometimes landing, they took many Towns and got great plunder. They effected nothing of greater moment, being hindered of entring into the most convenient Towns by the Carthaginians who every where met them with very good courage, having recovered whatsoever M. Rigulus had possessed, and punished the revoltors. For Hamilcar having ranged through Nubidia and Mauritania, had reduced and quieted all that Tract, imposing a fine of a thousand Talents of silver, and twenty thousand Oxen, and punishing the prime men who were thought to favour the Romans, three thousand whereof were Crucified. But the enemies encounter was not so formidable to the Romans as their own ignorance in the places, and their dangers in the sea; for sailing to Meninx, an Island of the Lolophagi, near unto the lesser Syrtis, they struck upon shallow places, the Tide going out, and were detained till the ships being emptied of their burthens, were by the Tide coming in again relieved from extreme danger. Having therefore escaped so great a distresse, and fearing those dangerous places, without delay they sailed away as if they fled, not that no lesse a calamity attended them then what they had avoided. To Panormus indeed they returned very safe, but in their Voyage to Italy, as they sailed about the Promontory of Palinurus, which reacheth out into the sea from the Lucanian Mountains, a terrible storm arising sank above threescore great ships, together with many horse-boats and vessels of Burthen. The City being exceedingly grieved at such frequent losses, as if the very winds and water denied the Romans the Sovereignty of the sea, the Senate decreed that their Navy should consist but of threescore ships, for the guard of Italy and transportation of provisions to their Army in Sicily. Neverthelesse this misfortune hindered not one of the Consuls C. Sempronius from his Triumph over the Carthaginians on the Calends of April, ten days after Cn. Cornelius Proconsul had made the like Triumph. There were Censors that year created at Rome, but L. Posthumius L. F. L. N. Megellus (who was likewise then Pretor) dying in his Office, the other Censor D. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera did also lay down his Office.

The next Summer C. Aulus L. F. C. N. Cotta, and P. Servilius C. F. Cn. N. Geminus being Consuls, crossed over into Sicily, and amongst other Towns took Himera (upon the River Himera) but void of Inhabitants, whom in the night time the Carthaginians had carryed away. Yet it was a great advantage to have the possession of so considerable a place, and hereby the Romans wiped away that disgrace they had heretofore received at this City; for they had failed of their expectation of taking this City (named likewise Therma) by the covetousness of their souldiers. [For a certain Captive within the City, to whom was committed the custody of one of the Gates, that he might thereby recover his liberty, did upon an appointed night give admittance to the Roman Souldiers, who were sent to take possession of the City. When the chief of them were entred, they desiring to ingross the richest spoils unto themselves, gave order, To have the Gates shut again and no more men to be let in. Whereupon the Thermitans receiving an Alarm took arms, and the Romans by reason of their small number not able to resist, resist, and having no reliefe from their Friends, whom they had shut out, were rewarded according to their Folly, being every man of them slain.] Himera being thus reduced into the Roman Power, (C. Aurelius the Consull thinketh of besieging Lipara, which had been so often in vain attempted; And in order thereunto gathereth together the choicest souldiers they had in all Sicily, and borrowing ships of Hiero, transporteth them into the Liparean land. From whence having occasion to return to Messana, to consult the Entrails of Sacrifices, he deputed his Lieutenant in the siege his Kinsman P. Aureolus Pecunniola (some say Q. Cassius a Colonell) with order, diligently to defend the Workes, but otherwise not to fight at all: But he, not observing the Consulls advice, and thinking it would much redound to his Credit, to take Lipara in his absence, made an Assault upon the City, and that to his Cost; for, not being able to Master it, he lost many men, and by a fall out of the Town had one of his Forts set on fire, having also much adoe to defend his Camp. But upon the return of Aurelius, Fortune wheeling about, there was a very great slaughter made at the taking of the City, after which he proceeded to the punishment of the Colonell, whom he commanded to be beaten with stripes, and take pay among the common souldiers; a very remarkable severity, whereof he made some other proofes in the time of his Consullship. When Lipara was taken, an Immunity was granted to the Posterity of Timasitheus (once Governour of these places) that they should for ever be free from all Taxes and Tribute; wherein the Romans manifested the constancy of their Thankfulness, not to be outworne by time; because when the Pirates of Lipara had taken a Golden Cup, which they had sent to Apollo of Delphos, Timasitheus caused both it, and the Embassadors who conveyed it, to be safely conducted into Greece, and the Men back again to Rome.

The Romans afterward besieging Eriza a very strong Castle, with forty thousand foot, and a thousand Horfe, were neither able to take it, neither durst they fight with the Carthaginians: For since the misfortune of M. Regulus, the Romans stood so much in fear of the Elephants that they alwayes avoided Battell. Oftentimes within the Territories of Lilybæum, and often in the Selinuntian fields, they have stood in Battell-array about halfe a mile from the Enemy, yet durst neither venture according to their wonted Courage, to begin the Charge, or descend into plain and open ground, but still kept themselves in craggy and difficult places. The Carthaginians hereupon erecting their Spirits, (seeing they now had Confidence in their land Army, and knew the Romans had had greater losses by tempests at Sea, then themselves by unluckie fights, especially having intelligence of the Senates Resolution to set out no more Navies) conceived hopes of recovering Sicily, if they did but send good store of land and sea-forces thither. But their main impediment was want of Money, the late continuall Warres having exhausted their Old store, and consumed their new raised Taxes. They sent therefore Embassadors to Prolomy King of Egypt, to borrow two thousand Talents of Money. The King being loath to offend either them, or the Romans (being both in League with him) offered himself as a Mediatour of Peace between them: But notwithstanding all importunities he denied the Carthaginians Request, saying, He would willingly helpe a Friend against an Enemy, but thought it not fit to assist one Friend against another. About the same time at Rome Tib. Coruncianus was the first of the Plebeians who was created Chief Priest. The same year also Censors were created, because the Duties of that Office could not last year be performed, one of the Censors dying, and the other laying down his Commission, M. Valerius M. F. M. N. Maximus Messalla, and P. Sempurnus P. F. P. N. Sophus made the seven and thirtieth Lustration. Two hundred ninety seven thousand, seven hundred ninety seven Citizens were rated. This was a sad and severe Censourship, for in taking a view of the Senate, Thirteen were degraded, four hundred young Knights had their horses taken away, and made common stipendiarie souldiers. This came to pass by the Complaint of C. Aurelius the Consull, who informed the Censors, That in Sicily, when need required, being commanded to their Duty, they had refused to obey. The Consull, not content with this Revenge for their contempt of Discipline, prevailed likewise with the Senate to keep back their Pay. And truly as times then went, the consideration of his severity and strictness of Discipline, as well as his exploits performed, was occasion of his Triumph made over the Carthaginians and Sicilians upon the Ides of April. The next year was fuller of Threats, then action: For great preparations being made on both sides, and each standing in some fear of the other, the whole summer passed away without any considerable thing done. L. Caelius L. F. C. N. Metellus, and C. Furius C. F. C. N. Pacilus, being Consulls, transporting their Legions over into Sicily, neither themselves much provoked the Enemy, or were provoked by them, though Asdruball a new Carthaginian Generall was lately come thither with two hundred ships, an hundred and forty Elephants, and twenty thousand Horfe and Foot. This business caused the Senate to enter into Consultation of preparing another Navy; for the Publick Treasures began to be exhausted by protracting the Warre, and since the Misfortune of M. Regulus, the Legions degenerated from their wonted Valour, and though all things should succeed prosperously at Land, yet 'twas manifest, the Carthaginians could not be kept off Sicily, so long as they had the sovereignty of the Seas. Resuming therefore their former resolutions, they began to put confidence again in their ships, and with all care to trimme the old, and build new ones. In the mean time L. Metellus being left at Panormus, C. Furius returned to Rome, to the chusing of the new Consuls, who were C. Asilius M. F. M. N. Regulus, and and L. Manlius A.F. P.N. Uniso, to these was committed the charge of preparing the Navy and men for the ships; L. Metellus was continued in his Command, with Commission to manage the War in Sicily as Proconsul.

Asdrubal understanding that one of the Romans Generals was absent with half their forces, and computing with himself, that though the Armies had long stood in Battel-array one against the other, the Romans had out of fear declined fight, being now no longer able to bear the complaints of his own souldiers who accused him of cowardize, he drew all his forces out of Lilybeum, and after a long and difficult march through the Selinuncian Territories, he invaded those of Panormus and there pitched his Camp. It fortun'd, that the Proconsul, with the remainder of the Roman strength was then at Panormus to guard their Associates, now harvest grew on, in reaping and carrying in their grain. He, having intelligence that some of the enemies spies lay secretly at Panormus, commanded every man in the City to meet together in an Assembly, then giving order they should examine one another, and question those who were least known, What they were; or what business they had at Panormus, found out the spies and seized on them. By them he understood the enemies designs, and observing there was more rashness than good counsel in their expedition, pretended great fear, and kept himself within the works of the City, that so he might encrease their foolish confidence. Whereupon Asdrubal growing bolder, advanced his forces, spoiling and burning all the corn in the fields, and marching up even to the walls of the City. The Proconsul regarded neither the loss sustained nor the disgrace thence redounding, foreseeing that if he did a little longer forbear, the Carthaginians would sufficiently satisfy him for both with good Use. Above all, he thought good to expect till they crossed the River Orestus, which runneth on the South side of the Town, and then he had contrived a sure and sudden Victory. To effect this, as all other things were ordered to signify his fear, so he placed but few souldiers upon the walls, desiring that the enemy should not understand either the courage or number of his men. This counsel succeeded according to his expectation, both the enemy by his confidence, and fortune by a sudden chance furthering the design: For Asdrubal Forded the River with his Foot, Horse and Elephants, and planted his Camp close under the walls of the City, with so much contempt of the enemies Cowardize, that he pitched his Tents without any works of defence about them, thinking there was no need of ditch or bulwark.

Thither the Suters and Merchants bringing great plenty of Corne and Wine, the Mercenaries drank stoutly, and elevating their voices according to their several dialects, in much noise and confusion gave good notice of their present temper, that they were not very sober. Then did the Proconsul think the fittest time to send those his men who were ready armed to provoke the enemy to fight, and it succeeded so happily, that still sending out by degrees fresh supplies, Asdrubal's whole Army at length came out of the Camp. L. Caelius the Proconsul placeth part of the light armed men before the Trench, giving order, If the Elephants approached to sling their darts at them, and if they found themselves sore pressed to retire into the Trench, and shance come out again to a fresh charge. The mean Artificers and common rout he commanded to carry darts and weapons, and sling them over the wall that the light armed men should not want plenty of them. Himself with his companies completely armed, stood in Rank and File within the gate over against the enemies right Wing. They who were already engaged sometimes being overpower'd in number retreated in good order, sometimes being assisted by supplies from the Town did maintain the fight. When the Rectors of the Elephants desiring in emulation to seem Authors of the Victory as well as Asdrubal, and advancing with their beasts, beat back those who opposed them, and rashly pressing upon them (as they retired toward the City) came up even to the Trench. But then a shower of Arrows flying from the walls, and fresh light armed men assaulting them with Spears and Darts, the Elephants being wounded began to rage, and basking themselves which way soever anger and pain led them, turned upon their own men, trampled under foot, routed and disorder'd whole companies of armed men.

Whereupon the Proconsul crying, This is the time of the long look't for Victory, issueth out, and being fresh and in good rank had an easie victory over the confused multitude of the enemy; there was a great slaughter made both in the field and in the pursuit, their calamity being encreased by a sudden chance which one would have thought of advantage to them: For about the same time the Carthaginian Navy appearing at shore, the whole multitude trembling and blind with fear, promiscuously ran thither as to the only refuge, in which hurly burly many were trodden under feet by the Elephants; many venturing to swim, and many too hastily scaling the ships and tumbling down perished in the sea. Neither before this time nor after it, amongst all their prosperous exploits, had the Romans any Victory more glorious; whereby the Romans resumed their former confidence and courage, and the enemy was so disheartened with fear, that they cast off not only all hopes but all thoughts of a land Army so long as that War lasted.

Twenty thousand Carthaginians are said to be slain, six and twenty Elephants were presently taken, and afterward all the rest. For the Proconsul thinking it hard for his ignorant men to catch the beasts being loose and enraged, commanded a Cryer by Proclamation to promise Liberty and safety to any prisoner by whose means the Elephants should be taken; hereby laying first hold on those who were most gentle and familiar, by their help they easily brought in the rest. L. Metellus sent them all to Rome, having invented a pretty way for their transportation; for his ships not being fit for the purpose, he gathered and bound together many Hogf-heads, fastning a Rafter between every two that they should neither dash together nor yet part one from the other, then planking them over, spreading earth and dirt upon them, and erecting walls on each side in the form of stables, the Elephants otherwise very fearful of sailing by water, entred them and were safely conveyed to Rhegium.

Alcibiades from this overthrow escaped to Silybann, but being condemned at Carthage while he was absent, and afterward upon his return apprehended, he was accordingly executed. The Carthaginians now considering their Armies were routed, their Elephants taken, all Sicily lost except Silybann and Drepanus, that the Romans having again set out a Navy, were very potent both at land and sea, began to think of Peace, willing to accept of it on any tolerable conditions. Whereupon they remembered M. Regulus and the conditions he once propounded to them, and perswaded themselves that by his means they might prevail either for peace or at least for what they next desired, an exchange of prisoners; nothing doubting but that for his own sake he would effectually interpose himself in such a business: For what man can be imagined so obstinate as not to free himself from the miseries of a Gaole, and desire to see his dearest relations, and enjoy his Liberty, Country, Dignities and Honours? M. Regulus hath a wife and children at Rome, friends and kindred in the Senate and publick offices, a Cousin German now Consul, he is both much beloved by the Senate and people of Rome for his former victories, and pined for his afflictions; if therefore he beareth any good will to himself, or findeth any respect from his friends, no man certainly will be more earnest in prosecuting, or is more likely by favour to effect such a design. He accepted the employment, not out of any hope or desire to do himself good, as afterward appeared, but that he might in person the more effectually move the Senate to have a care of the Commonwealth. So being joyned with the Carthaginian Embassadors, when he was come to the City, he would not enter the Gates though much entreated by the Romans, alledging, The Custome of his Country to give Audience to the Embassadors of an enemy without the City. The Senate being accordingly assembled, he amongst the Carthaginian Embassadors delivered his Message, That himself also being by the War a servant to the Carthaginians, had command from his Masters to propound chiefly, That the war may be concluded upon what terms should seem fit to both parties, or that at least an exchange of prisoners would be granted. The Embassadors presently withdrawing, he likewise accompanied them; neither, though he was earnestly solicited, would he be present in the Senate at the debate of the business till the Carthaginians assented to it. Then sitting silent till his opinion was required, he thus expressed himself, Consul's Fathers, I am still a Roman: my Body indeed, as Fortune would have it, is in the power of the enemies, but my Soul, not subject to Fortune, is still the same. Following therefore the reason of my Soul, which is my own, rather than the inclinations of my Body, which is anothers, my advice is, You would neither exchange prisoners nor conclude a peace. For to restore the Captives, while the war continueth is disadvantageous: They have no Commanders in hold but my self who am an old man, you have many, and those young, amongst which are some no way to be despised. And to finish the war, unless upon very ample terms, or without a complete universal Victory, as it becometh not your Wisdom, so it is pernicious to the Commonwealth. I know you meet with many difficulties in managing the war, for no great affairs can be transacted without great pains and cost: But if you rightly consider the state of Carthage, you will find all things tending to victory to be much the better on your part. We were indeed once overcome in a great Battel, whether it were my fault or fortunes; but we have so often routed their Armies, that the confidence they had assumed upon my overthrow is now, by the Victory at Panormus, pressed down to the utmost despair. They have lost all Sicily, except one or two Cities, and in the other Ilands their condition is naught. You have a Navy which they dare not encounter, so that in that part of the war ye are also superiours. And the losses ye have sustained by Tempest hath not bereaved you of so much strength as it hath taught you Circumspection. The want of money perhaps is equal on both sides; but the Italians are more obedient to you then are the Africans to the Carthaginians, whom as they never truly loved, so have they of late learn't to hate more perfectly. For not being provoked by any such injury they revolted freely to me, but now since their former masters have wasted their Grounds, plundered their Cartel, exacted their Monies and slain their Nobles, what do you think they can more desire, then that a new Army would come from hence into Africa? But that your leavies of men are easie and large, that your souldiers are valiant, of the same Language, the same Mind, the same Manners, Religion, City and Kindred, I take to be so great an advantage, that if in all things else ye were exceeded, this one only thing would be sufficient to balance the war, and make the Victory doubtful on the enemies side, for what help is there in a company of Mercenaries against such a force? and if there were any, the Carthaginians have bereaved themselves of it by their cruelty, and they have made it now as difficult to hire strangers, as it was before to govern them. Xanthippus to whom Carthage is indebted for its preservation, having been so ingratiously and treacherously used, is sufficient warning to others how they lend their assistance to such a people who know not how to recompence the greatest desert but by the greatest injuries. Nay, the very common and meanest

Bar-

Barbarians, a Brutish and slavish sort of men, will be deterred by Cruelties so often exercised upon their Fellowes, who have been sometimes murdered by hangmen, or their fellow Soldiers, sometimes exposed into barren and uninhabited Islands, receiving instead of the pay they have fought for, most inhumane punishments, and horrible deaths. And this Conscript Fathers is my Opinion, that neither Peace is to be made with Carthage, nor yet an exchange of Prisoners granted.

This Counsell displeased not the Senate, if it could have been executed with the safety of him who gave it; but the more he neglected himself for the Common good, the more they pitied him, and manifestly inclined upon any termes whatsoever to restore so Gallant and Generous a Person to his Country. And voices were given out, that seeing he was now so happily returned from foreign Captivity, he might lawfully tarry in the City, or be detained there. The High Priest likewise affirmed, that he might stay, without incurring the guilt of Perjury. But he to the Amazement of the Senate it selfe, with a fierce Spirit, and severe Countenance, proceeded, saying, why do ye not resolve this doubt? follow my Advice and regard not me. Ye in vain attempt that which will be neither pleasing to your selves, nor profitable to the Country, nor honest in me. For suppose, for a while ye would be willing and joyfull to see me amongst you, when once the short spurt of this affection is vanished, the Baseness of my Return will make me more odious to you, then my absence made me desirable. For my part I am resolved not to live in that City, where after an African slavery, I cannot maintain the dignity of an honest Citizen, and if I should desire it, my fidelity would hinder it, the remembrance of my sacred Oath would hinder it, and my Reverence of the Gods, by the Invocation of whom I assured the Carthaginians of my return. And should I forswear my selfe, I fear that Revenge would be taken not only on me, but on your selves, and the whole Roman People also. The Gods, believe me, are no vain things, and will not without Punishment be affronted by the Perjuries and Contempts of Man. If any one be of opinion that in Religion I may be absolved, that the bookes of the Augurs mention expiation of such crimes, and that Attonement may be made by Ceremonies and Sacrifices for Perjury and Treason, I would have him understand the Majesty of the Gods is more severe, then being offended by Perjury, to be appeased by any Inventions of Men, neither is it agreeable to Reason, that a Guilt contracted by the sins of man, should be washed away with the blood of Beasts. As for my selfe, I am not ignorant that great and exquisite torments are prepared for me at Carthage. But to deceive a trust, I think to be worse then all of them, for this would indeed hurt me, as for the Torments they hurt only something about me. Think not that man miserable who is able to endure misery. Slavery, Reproach, Contempt, Griefe, Hunger and Watching, I never yet esteemed evil, but now by a long custom they have left off to be troublefom to me. That they are tollerable, I have learn't by suffering them; and if once they be intended to that degree, as not to be born by Man, Death will quickly free me not only from them, but from all other Calamities. Nothing therefore is to be feared for him who feareth not Death, which is easie at any time to obtain, and truly I had inflicted it on my selfe, but that I thought it the part of a man rather to overcome sorrow then to avoid it. I have spoken these few and confused words, that ye may understand, I am not to be perswaded from my Opinion, and withall that you should not bewaile me as an unfortunate and miserable Man: My Resolution is easy and constant: 'Tis my care to return to Carthage, what I shall there suffer I leave to the Gods.

'Tis reported that the more effectually to move them he affirmed, that before he was dismissed from Carthage, they had given him a gentle Poison, which by slow degrees feeding on his vitall spirits, should consume him after the exchange was made. Wonderfull was the constancy of this Man, who, rather then swerve from the Rule of Honesty, did with more earnestness pursue Contumelies, Torments and Death, then others avoid them; a true and profitable Lesson to Posterity, That those men only are prepared to endure any Torments, and are constant in their honest resolutions, who have a sense of their own nobility, and think themselves borne not onely for this world. For certainly M. Regulus would not willingly have undergone so great miseries; if he had not thought that after Death there are great Rewards for the Virtuous, and great punishment for evil men. The Senate therefore having made a Decree according to the opinion of M. Regulus, he with a settled countenance followed his Sullen and angry Matters, by whom it appeared that they would cruelly revenge the indignity of their repulse upon his Person, inso-much as many were moved to detain him against his will. Moreover his Wife Marcia, and his Children making Lamentable complaints, the Consuls said, if he carried they would not deliver him up, neither would they hinder his going. So he refusing to discourse with his Wife, and avoiding the Embraces and kisses of his little Children, was carried back to Carthage, where with cruell torments he was put to death. For cutting off his Eyelids, they kept him awhile in a dark place, then in the heat of the Sunshine they suddenly brought him out, and forced him to look up into the sky, at length they put him into a Wooden chest (right over against the Sun) full of nailes on the inside, and so narrow that he was forced alwayes to stand upright; if at any time he lean't on one side to ease his weary body, he was pricked and goaded with the nailes, and so in torment and continuall watching yielded up the Ghost.

This was the end of M. Asilius Regulus, much more glorious then his Life, though long led with with great honesty and Honour: He was a man of great Integrity of Manners, of an Invincible Spirit, and for his Counsell not to be despised, wherein neither his own nor after ages could accuse him, but that he seemed not very moderately to bear his prosperous Fortune, and that by denying the Carthaginians request he was the occasion of the wars continuance for many years after to the great detriment of both Cities. But he wiped off this his fault by his other many egregious virtues, and chiefly by his wonderful constancy at his death, being more happy in suffering calamitie then if he could have avoided it. The Senate hearing the news of his death, and the Barbarous cruelty of the Carthaginians, delivered up the Noblest of the Captives to Marcia and her children, whom they shut up in an Engine thrust through with sharp irons, resolving to put them to the like death as Regulus had suffered; for five whole daies they had no food allowed them; in which Bostar with grief and hunger pined to death; Hamilcar being stronger in body continued five dayes longer, shut together with the carcasfe of Bostar, with sustenance sufficient only to prolong his miserable life, Till at length the Magistrates understanding what was in doing, did restrain their cruelty, commanding that the Ashes of Bostar should be conveyed into his own Country, and that the other prisoners should be handled with more mercy. Whereby appears a remarkable difference of manners in the two Cities, in that the one being not unjustly offended, nor able with security to offend, with horrid punishments extinguished that virtue they ought to have revered; the other mitigated a most just revenge not regarding their own enraged grief, but the Rules of Humanity, and that moderation which becometh Illustrious Empires.

Etymologicum in Kapnys.

UPON the departure of the Carthaginian Embassadors the Consuls having Order from the Senate to transport their Army into Sicily, did very readily obey, being highly incensed against the enemy for M. Regulus his sake, and likewise provoked with emulation and conceiving great hopes from the Victory of L. Metellus Proconsul. For they measured not the greatnesse of the businesse so much by the losse of the Carthaginians, who were much weakened by the losse of an Army and so many Elephants, but chiefly they were encouraged because the souldiers, having successfully fought against the beasts, did now no more stand in fear of them. And hopes were conceived the war might suddenly be finished if opportunities were not neglected. The Consuls therefore with a Navy of two hundred ships, and four Legions sailed to Panormus, where taking in likewise the other forces and ships (unless what were left for the guard and security of some places) they went to Lilybaum with 240 Beaked ships, threescore Barks of a shorter size, called Cercursi, and many other vessels of all sorts, with resolution to make an assault upon it. This is that famous siege of Lilybaum, which beginning the fourteenth year of this war, lasted full ten years, and at length was ended, neither with the surprise of the City, nor with its surrendry, but together with the whole War. For both the Romans and Carthaginians well understanding of what concernment that City was, either to the Guard of the African Coast, or the Empire of Sicily, did with all their might, the one

one assault, the other defend it. The Triumph of L. Metellus did somewhat comfort the City of Rome, after their sorrow for M. Regulus, not only with the memory and consideration of their successes, but with the sweetness of Revenge also over so cruel and inhumane a People: He Triumphed Proconsul over the Carthaginians, the seventh of the Ides of September, thirteen of the Enemies Commanders were led before his Chariot, and a great troope of Elephants, even an hundred and Twenty; some reckon many more. These being afterwards produced when the Games were celebrated, were chased up and down the Circus with speares headed with iron, that the People might accustom themselves to contemne those beasts they had heretofore so terribly feared. Fabius Placcus affirms they were all slain, the Romans not caring to make use of them themselves, and thinking it no way for the advantage of the Common-wealth, to make a Present of so considerable a strength to any Prince. The same year Corn was very cheap at Rome, a bushell for a penny, at the same price was sold a gallon of wine, thirty pound of dried figgs, ten pounds of oile, and twelve pound of flesh. For there was greater store of these Commodities then of money, which by the long continuance of warre grew very scarce. While these things hapned at Rome, the Consuls in Sicily assaulted Lilybaeum with all their strength, and the besieged as stoutly resisted. The first attempt was against a Tower, which stood farthest toward the Libyan sea, this being demolished, they did by degrees proceed to those which were next, till they had destroyed six. For the more easy battering of the rest they began to fill up the Trenches, that they might draw over and plant their Engines. Though the labour were very great, for the ditch was threescore cubits broad, and forty deep) they did readily set upon and diligently promote the work. The Carthaginians to hinder their design, made holes on the inside of the Trench, out of which they cast the rubbidge again, but, the heapes still encreasing, and the ditch at length made even with the ground, (by reason of the multitude of Labourers) they changed their Counsell, and erected another wall within the former: Himilco being at all Workers indefatigable, who besides the multitude of Inhabitants in the City, had ten thousand Mercenaries, and did by his wisdom, Vigilance and constancy elude and overcome all the Enemies force and Stratagems. He suffered nothing to be out of order among his own men, nor any thing to be secure on the Enemies part; he built Work against Work, digged Mine against Mine, opposed Armes to Armes, sometimes he issued forth, fighting with such resolution, that in these tumultuary skirmishes there were sometimes slain little fewer, then usually fall in set Battells.

The Romans undermining the Foundation of the Walls, Himilco made his countermine over against the place where he observed the Romans to cast out earth, and opening their Mine he sent in forthwith a Band of Armed souldiers, who set upon the naked Romans busie at work, and slew a great number; and as many were burnt with brushfaggots (thrown into the Trench and set on fire) while they approached the Walls to help their fellows. Notwithstanding feare and consternation of mind encreased among the besieged, whereby some Mercenary Commanders taking advantage, and pretending want of pay, plotted to betray the City to the Romans, nothing doubting but that they could easily induce every man his souldiers to approve of the design. On a certain night therefore slipping out of the Town into the Roman Camp, they declared the state of the City, and what they had intended; Amongst the other Mercenaries at Lilybaeum, there was one Alexon an Achaian, a Man not unskilfull in Martiall Affaires, and of singular Integrity: He understanding the Traytors design, without delay discovers it to Himilco, Himilco as in a great and imminent danger, immediately summons together all the Mercenary Commanders, who were yet in the Town, declares to them what was in agitation, and by whom, and vehemently inveighing against them, he exhorteth those who are present, not to become partners in the rashness and Treachery of others, that persisting in their Duty, they should find all fair dealing from the Carthaginians, their Pay should be certain, and great Rewards moreover accumulated, that if they tainted themselves with the infamous crime of Treason, they would be hateful to God and man; withall, as much money as in hast and fear he could at present raise, he distributes among them, promising that himselfe would take care to see the Common souldiers payed as may be discharged.

An Oration made in season, hath certainly great power over the Minds of men, especially if the gravity of the speaker be mixed with truth and sincerity to be relied upon. Every one assented to what Himilco spake, and chearfully offered their utmost endeavours to continue their souldiers in their Duty. Himilco commending them, and furthermore encouraging them with hopes, commands every one to apply himselfe to his own Company, and endeavour to keep them in subjection: He sendeth likewise along with them Hannibal, the son of Hannibal, who perished in Sardinia, and Alexon the Achaian; Hannibal to the Gauls, with whom he was acquainted, and very gracious, by Reason of his former conversation with them in the Wars; Alexon to other Mercenaries of severall Nations, by all whom he was equally beloved. These engaging their Words, that whatsoever Himilco had promised should be performed, so effectually made up the business, that the Traitors a while after returning to the Walls, were not onely kept out, but beaten back with darts, and reproached for their Villany. So they returning to the Consuls without effecting their Design, were nevertheless rewarded with Gifts, and had Land in Sicily bestowed on them.

Thus did the fidelity of Alexon at that time support the Carthaginian Affaires, brought al-

- most into a desperate condition by this Treason. He had before likewise preserved the Agrigentines, whom the Mercenaries of Syracuse had by the like wickedness plotted to betray, and therefore deserved to have his memory and praises recorded in History.
- The Besieged were afterward much encouraged by the coming of new Auxiliaries. For the Carthaginians, though they were ignorant of what happened at Lilybæum, did judge it fit to carry on affairs with much Vigour; therefore they commanded Adherbal the Admiral to provide a Navy and convey Men, Money, and Corn to Lilybæum. By him was sent Hannibal the son of Hamilcar, who having a fresh gale of wind from the Egean Islands, sailed directly into the port of Lilybæum, his men ready armed for fight, and resolving to break through all opposition. The Romans had from the beginning of the siege stopped up the mouth of the haven by sinking fifteen ships, which they had for that purpose laden with stones, being therefore suddenly overtaken with the Enemies' host, and fearing lest themselves might by the force of the winds be driven into the Port, a place made unsafe for Navigation, they did not at all oppose the Enemy.
Hannibal safely entered the Harbour, and landing his men to the number of ten thousand, was received into the City with very great joy of the Lilybæans. The Romans seeing they could not prevent the Enemies' Arrival, entered into Consultation how to defend their Works, which they thought Himilco would not delay to set upon, having so great a recruit of fresh souldiers; neither were they deceived, for Himilco intending to make use both of his new firenght and of the Courage of the others now revived, summons all his forces together, and by hopes of Victory and ample rewards persuades them to make Wallie, and having disposed his Companies as the Occasion required, by break of day he assauleth the Romans works in many places. The Romans were provided for them, and where they feared most danger had placed strong Guards, with these a very sharpe fight was begun, many fell on both sides, for they fought with great Courage and Resolution, and the number of men was great on each part, no less then twenty thousand issued out of the City, and were opposed by a greater Multitude of the Besiegers.
For the Consuls having raised Auxiliaries from their friends in Sicily, were above an hundred thousand strong, whereof threescore thousand were employed in the siege, the Residue being sent abroad to bring in Provisions. The fight therefore being very hot in every place, the sharpest Contention was about the Engines, both striving to spoile them, other to defend them, with so great Vehemence, that they spared their own lives no more then their Enemies. A great number of slain men lay in that station where the Assault first began, the Clamour and noise of the Warriours, and Terror of the Battel were much increased by another Company which brake out with links and torches, rushing through all dangers and Deaths to set fire on the Engines, and the Roman souldiers were very near giving place to the Superiority of the Enemy, as no longer able to defend their Engines. But Himilco seeing many of his men perish, and the Romans as yet nothing to remit of their Courage in resisting, sounded a Retreat, and went first out of the Battel. Neither did the Romans pursue him, being content they had preserved their works which were almost given for lost.
- The next night Hannibal, while the Enemy was weary after the fight, and observed not his Motion, secretly stole out of the Harbour with the ships he came in, and went to Adherbal at Drepanus, carrying along with him the Horsemen, who being of no use to the besieged in a close place, he rightly judged might otherwise be better employed. These making frequent excursions from Drepanus, infested the high ways, obstructed the Conveyance of provisions, sur-prized many foragers who straggled far from the Campe, afflicted the Roman Associates with all kinds of misery, and very much confounded the counsells and designs of the Consuls. Adherbal likewise much perplexed them at sea, suddenly falling sometime on the Sicilian, sometime on the Italian shore, leaving nothing unattempted whereby he might mischief the Romans.
Hence it came to pass that there was great scarcity in the Roman Camp, for they had almost no food left but onely the flesh of beasts, many died of Famine, and many more, as is usuall in such cases, of Diseases; whereupon many thousands perished, and therefore it was concluded that one of the Consuls with his Legions should return to Rome to the Assembly of the People, that the other Besiegers might have the greater Plenty. After this the Romans again with greater pains and diligence endeavoured with earth and stones to stop up the mouth of the Haven, fortifying the Damme on both sides with strong pieces of timber joyned together cross wayes, and fastned with iron Anchors, to containe the heap of earth and stones from washing away. But their labour though great proved fruitless, for the sea was so deep, that whatsoever was sung in, was carried aside before it lighted right, and upon the arising of Tempests, the Tide being very violent, destroyed their Work.
- But the very fame of the Work did for a time keep the Haven block't up, which very much troubled the Carthaginians, that they could now by no means hold intelligence with their friends, neither durst any man undertake to visit the Lilybæans and give an account of their Condition, till at length one Hannibal surnamed Rhodius ingaged himself to enter the City, and having viewed all things, to returne with a faithfull Account. The promise pleased the Carthaginians: But they had little faith in it; because they knew beside the heapes of rubbish, that the Haven was watched and warded by the Roman ships at Anchor there: But he having rigged a private ship he had, sailed to one of the Islands over against Lilybæum, and the next day having a favourable wind, at ten of the clock in the day time, openly in the face of the enemy wondring at his confidence entred the Haven. But the Consul to intercept him in his return, in the night time placed ten choice ships on each side the Haven, five as near the mouth as might be. Hannibal trusting in the swiftness of his Vessel came out in the day time; the Romans were ready in the expectation of him, and with all their endeavours set forward against him, but he was so much too quick for them, that not contenting to escape he moreover insulted over them, sometimes sailing, sometimes wheeling about as if he would challenge them to fight. When he had often used this bold exploit, it proved of great advantage to the Carthaginian affairs, in that the Besieged were infinitely comforted with messages from their friends, in that at Carthage they daily understood the state and progresse of things at Lilybaeum as occasion required, and in that the Romans were so much ashamed and maddened at the rashness of the men which they could not revenge. He was much helped in his design by his knowledge of the Channel and the passages thereabouts; for between those Fenny and moorish places whereby is the passage to Lilybaeum, he diligently observed a very safe and sure course for his ship. For when he came from the main Sea within sight of the City, he so turned his ship, that the Stern of it was toward Italy, and from the Foredeck the Tower of Lilybaeum which was upon the shore, hindred the sight of all other Towers toward Africa, and this is the only safe way of entring the Harbour with full sail.
the

And now many more being encouraged by the boldness and success of Hannibal, began to correspond with Lilybaeum, till at length by a certain chance a vessel of great swiftness was taken. For though in other places the Romans Dams were carried away by the winds and water, yet in one place, where the Sea was somewhat shallow, they stood firm; there the ship striking and being detained was taken by the Romans, and being furnished with stout souldiers and good rowers proved the ruine of Hannibal also. For having entred the City in the night time and returning in the open day, he spied this ship every where waiting upon his motion, whereupon apprehending danger, at first he fled; but that being in vain, he made some opposition and was taken by the Romans.

The Romans being possessed of this ship, and observing the same course of entring the Haven, did afterward easily hinder any other vessels from sailing to Lilybaeum. The Besiegers began now very fiercely to intend their main business, and assaulking one of the Works near the Sea, drew the whole company of the besieged to defend that side where the storm was made, whereby opportunity was given to other forces who were reserved for that purpose to make an assault upon the contrary part and take the outward wall; but this proved in vain, for the Carthaginian General seasonably coming with a supply of choice men, beat the Romans out with great slaughter. Another great success gave the Besiegers hope of the universal Victory; there arose by chance very great gusts of wind, which as it were on set purpose blew hard upon the Romans works, shaking their very Rampires, and tumbling down the Towers built thereon. The townsmen were not ignorant of this, and thought now an opportunity given them by the gods of firing the Romans Engines, which they had so often in vain assaulted. The substance of the Engines was very apt to take fire, having been long felled and dried with the heat of the Sun. The Romans were not slack in defending themselves, but not to much purpose, for the enemy was directed by the light of the fire which had seized on the Engines, and assisted with the strength of the wind to cast their darts more surely and with greater force, the others received no less hinderance and danger thereby, then by the weapons of the enemies, for the wind being fierce and against the Romans blew smoke, and flame, and ashes into their mouths and eyes, and brought the enemies darts with greater violence upon them, whereas themselves by reason of darknesse were uncertain whither to direct their strokes, and by reason of the vehemency of the gusts were not well able to stand. So that all the Roman Engines and works either for digging of mines or battering the walls were every one consumed by this fire.

Then was all hopes laid aside of taking Lilybaeum by force, and the siege had been presently raised but that Hiero, sending plenty of Corn and provision, perswaded the Romans to stay; where not intending to make any more storms upon the City, they did on every side fence their Camp, resolving to commit the issue of things to Time and Fortune. The Besieged likewise building up what part of their walls had been battered, were now the more encouraged to endure the siege hereafter. These news were very sadly entertained at Rome, nevertheless they determined by war to make up what losses by war they had sustained: and their resolution herein was so immoveable, that, 'tis said, a Senator was slain in the very Court because he made mention of Peace.

Great preparations were now made, and a new leavy of ten thousand Rowers sent into Sicily, for they had sustained a great losse of them. The Consuls were P. Clodius Ap. F. C. N. Pulcher, and L. Junius C. F. C. N. Pullus. 'Tis falsely by some delivered, that this Clodius was the son of Cecus. He, when he was come into Sicily and had taken possession of the Army at Lilybaeum, assembled the Souldiers together, and sharply reprehended the former Consuls, That by their idleness and luxury they had trifled away time before Lilybaeum more like men besieged then besiegers, without any fruit, and to the losse and dishonour of the Roman Majesty. He was a very crabbed fowr man, and being Violent by Nature, and Arrogant by reason of his Nobility, he was apt to let fall Speeches and perform Actions not well becoming a serious sober man. He was very severe in punishing, letting passe no crime with pardon, but prosecuting even the very smallest with too great severity; himself in matters of the greatest moment miserably failing, even to madness. For he followed the former Consuls course which he had so sharply condemned in damming up the Haven, and (what argued greater folly) he rashly and inconsiderately assaulting Drepanus lost a very gallant Fleet, no less by his own indiscretion than by the valour of Adherball. He persuaded himself and his souldiers, that the enemy not having intelligence of what supplies were come from Rome, might be unawares surpris'd at Drepanus; not believing that the Romans had either courage or strength sufficient to provoke them at sea. So that making choice of two hundred and twenty of the best ships with the stoutest Rowers, and most valiant men out of the Legions (for they offered themselves freely as to a short businessse and certain prey, Drepanus being not above fifteen miles from Lilybaeum) he privately set sail about the third Watch, and had in the night time a prosperous Voyage, not being seen by the enemy. But at day break the ships being discovered not far from Drepanus, gave an Alarm to Adherball, because such a fight was there unusual, insomuch as no doubt was made but that it was the enemy who approached; the Carthaginians were forced either presently to encounter and enter fight, or to suffer themselves to be surrounded and besieged by the enemy; this latter they resolv'd against, because as it would have involved them in much trouble and danger, so it would have been imputed as a crime upon their miscarriage. Adherball therefore on a sudden called together his Sea-men, and by a Cryer summoning the Mercenaries to an Assembly, in a short but very pithy speech, admonish'd them what hopes there were of victory if they would readily and cheerfully take Arms, and what danger of a siege was imminent if they declined battel. When every man with one consent had agreed to follow his counsel, Adherball commending their obedience, forthwith gives order that they should take ship, and observing what course the Admiral Recer'd (wherein himself failed) to follow it. Whereupon he before the rest sail'd toward the main sea, going out of the Haven just under the Rocks hanging over it at the same time when the Roman ships entred on the other side. P. Clodius finding the enemy no whit dismay'd, or declining fight, as he had hoped, but stoutly prepared to defend themselves, was much troubled, and retreated back with his ships to encounter the enemy in the open seas. But his were in no good order, but as chanceably they had outfail'd one another, some were entred the Haven, others were making toward it, and some were just in the mouth of it: Whereupon it came to passe, that while they all endeavour'd to make a sudden return, they dash'd one against another, and struck their Oars together, till being got out of the Haven as well as they could, because they wanted time, they rang'd themselves in Battel-array just under the shore.

The Consul, who had fail'd in the Rere before, now changing his position, came before all and plac'd himself in the left Wing; but the Carthaginians sailing by the enemies left Wing with five Beaked ships, tack'd about facing the Romans, and had the open sea on his back, or ther ships as they came he command'd to place themselves at a convenient distance, and when all were order'd according to his mind he setteth forward against the enemy. And now sign of Battel being given from both the Admirals they fiercelly encounter on all sides, at first with equal hopes, but afterward to the Carthaginians better fortune. For though they had the lesser number of ships, to wit, but ninety armed; in other respects they did exceed, for their ships were better and their water-men more skilful; they had likewise made choice of a most convenient place of fight, for as often as they were hard put to it they had free egress into the open sea, where they could easily by their swiftness avoid the enemy, or if he long pursued them, return and encompass him. But the Romans being so near the shore had not the like convenience, they could neither sail into the main nor with safety well retire, but as often as the enemy press'd upon them, they either stuck in the sands or endanger'd themselves upon the shore. Being therefore unable to break through the enemy by force and charge him in the Rere, by reason of the slowness of their ships and unskilfulness of the Rowers, and being coop'd up in a narrow place not able from the Stern to help their fellows who were in danger, they were beaten to the Carthaginians little loss.

Polybium 1. 51.

To these difficulties was added another cause of despair from their Religion, and they thought themselves worsted by the anger of the gods, because the Consul undertook to fight contrary to the indication of the Birds, adding likewise a Jeer to his neglect; for because the Chickens did not eat, he command'd them to be flung into the sea, that they might drink though they would not feed. This occurrence made the souldiers more slack and faint-hearted, fighting, as they thought, with the ill will of the gods. But the author of all this calamity, when he had lost every thing else, he wanted neither wit nor boldness to preserve himself; for when he saw his ships in such numbers sunk and taken, he slips away between the shore and the enemy with thirty ships which stood next him. And that he might safely arrive to his Army at Lilybaeum, being to sail by some of the Carthaginians Guards, he adorn'd his ships in token of Victory. The Carthaginians therefore imagining the Consul had been victorious, and that his other ships would suddenly follow, suffer'd him safely to passe by, being themselves much terrified and dejected. The enemy took all the ships the Consul left behind, even ninety and three, together with the Souldiers and Rowers, except only those who striking upon the shore, cast themselves on land and fled. But in the fight a great number were sunk; for Clodius brought above two hundred from Lilybaeum. This great victory cost the Carthaginians very little, for they lost not not a man, much less a ship, and very few are said to be wounded; of the Romans eight thousand men were slain, and twenty thousand taken.

About the same time likewise the Carthaginians took some ships laden with Corne from Panormus, and carried them to Drepanus, and carrying provisions into Lilybaeum from the Territories of Drepanus, did plentifully relieve the besieged with accommodation of all sorts. Neither here did this yeares fortune make a stop, but afflicted the Romans with another great calamity, whereby they lost not onely the present possession of the seas, but all hopes of regaining it. For the other Consull L. Junius coming out of Italy with many ships of burthen, laden with Corn for the Army, and fifty beaked ships arrived at Messana, where he met with a great number of other Vessells, from the Army, and other parts of Sicily. Joyning himself with these, he made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty long ships, almost eight hundred ships of burthen, and saileth to Syracuse. Being arrived thither, he sendeth the Quaestors before with part of the Navy to Lilybaeum; himselfe remaineth at Syracuse, expecting those others from Messana, who were not able to overtake him, and taking in grain which his Midland friends brought down to the sea side. In the mean time Adherball having sent the Roman ships and Captives to Carthage (Fortune and Glory putting him forward to action) delivered thirty ships more to Carthalo, who had brought seventy, with as many ships of Burthen from Africa, and sent him to drive out the Roman ships from the Haven of Lilybaeum, or to fire or sink them. He at break of the day entring the Haven with great Terrour, some ships he boarded, and others he fired; in the mean time Himilco Governour of the City, made a sally with the Mercenaries upon those Romans who went to defend the ships, which caused great fear in the Camp. In fine Carthalo having destroyed not very many, carried away five, and directed his Course to Heraclea. Lying there in wait to obstruct the Romans Voiage to Lilybaeum, he heareth newes of a considerable Navy of all kinds of ships sailing by.

He therefore joyning other Commanders with himselfe, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty good ships, confiding in which strength, and animated by former success, he presently maketh out of the Haven to meet the Enemy. By the shore of Gelus the Navys came in sight one of the other, but the Roman Quaestors fearing a disadvantageous encounter, diverted their course to Phintiades, a Town in League with the Romans, at Phintiades there is no Haven, onely the rocks running out into the sea afford a pretty safe riding for ships. Here the Romans landing, prepared themselves for the Enemies coming, having brought Engines of offence out of the Town, and placed them on the shore for safeguard of the ships. The Carthaginians at first resolved to have besieged the Enemy, thinking that out of fear they would have fled into the Town, and have left their ships for a Prey. But when the Romans stood stoutly to their own defence, and that they found the fight full of danger, likewise not much trusting in a place somewhat inconvenient for the ships they desired; and having taken a few Vessells laden with provision they sailed to the River Halycus, not farre distant, there they healed their wounded men, observing the motion of the Enemy. Other Writers following, I believe, Philinus, affirm, that the Romans sustained greater loss; that the Quaestors being daunted at the first fight of the Enemy, in their flight to Phintiades left behind their ships of burthen, and all other Vessells but men of Warre, that in the fight fifty round Vessells, and threescore long ships were sunk, and thirteen so split and shattered that they were made unfit for service.

Not long after the Carthaginians still abiding at the River Halycus, L. Junius the Consull, having done his business at Syracuse, sailing toward Lilybaeum, about the Promontory of Pachynus, was discovered by some of Carthalo his ships, who thereupon with all speed makes out to meet him (being ignorant of all passages at Phintiades) that he might fight him as farre from Quaestor's Navy as might be, lest they should come in for his succour. The Consull seeing the Enemy make up toward him, not daring to fight, nor being able to avoid them, drives his ships into a rough and troublesome creeke, near Camerina, a greater fear overcoming this lesser, lest his whole Army should fall into the Enemies Power. Carthalo not daring to venter into the same place, takes up his station at a certain Promontory, from whence he might equally intend himselfe against either Navy. A while after, when the Winds blew high, the Carthaginian shipmasters (skillfull in such Affaires) foreseeing a tempest, perswaded Carthalo to forsake that station, and steere to Pachynus, and so the Carthaginians; but not without great paines, avoided the force of the Tempest; But both the Roman Navys utterly perished upon the Rocks, insomuch that of the whole shipwrack there remained not a piece of board of any use, excepting onely two ships, wherein the Consull with the small remainder of his men arrived at Lilybaeum. All the ships of provision were lost, and above an hundred long ships; but part of the Armie was saved, leaping into the sea and swimming to shore. The Senate, who had lately called home P. Claudius the Consull, for his miscarriage in Sicily, hearing also of Junius his misfortune, gave over all confidence in the seas, resolving nevertheless with all their strength and Counsell to prosecute the Warre by land. They thought good to continue the siege of Lilybaeum; appointing certain men to take care of conveyeing necessary accommodations in good season, to the Army there. Though the Carthaginians were Masters at sea, yet they were encouraged, in that at land they were superiour, and that almost all Sicily was either under their power, or in League with them: But they were not pleased with their Confalls this year, neither did they think that things would succeed prosperously under the Confalls command, because they had profaned the Rites of Religion; for 'tis said that L. Junius did likewise set aside neglecting the Indication of the Birds. They fled therefore to a new and unusual Refuge, and created a Dictatour to go into Sicily; whereas, before this time, never any one so impowered, had led an Army out of Italy. The Insolence of P. Clodius the Consul was then very notable, and almost incredible; For being commanded by the Senate to nominate a Dictatour, he named M. Claudius Glycias, who was either his Scribe, or one of his Sergeants; as if he had not sufficiently offended his Countrey, by what losses he had brought upon it, unless he had likewise abused the Majesty of the Empire with such a scoffe. Whereupon the whole Senate being justly incensed against him, he was forced to resign up his Office, and was referred to the censure of the People. What Authors Cicero had read, report he was condemned, but others have observed, that when no Question was to be made but that the People would condemn him, he escaped by a sudden chance, a storme then arising which dissolved the Assembly; And is seeming hereby that the Gods interposed themselves, they thought not fit to ordain any other meeting for the purpose. But Glycias being forced to disclaim his Office, in that the City was ashamed to see a man of mean ranke to be in Supreme Dignity, was nevertheless admitted to all spectacles after this time in a Noble Man's Robes. In his room A. Atilius A. F. C. N. Calatinus was nominated Dictatour, who made L. Caelius L. F. C. N. Metellus Master of the Horse, he who had Triumphed over the Carthaginians. These two went indeed into Sicily, but performed no very memorable action there.

In the mean time L. Junius, much troubled at his cross fortune, and desirous to wipe away the blot of his shipwracke, by some noble Exploit, watching all opportunities of Action, did at length find a way to take Eryx, by the Treachery of some within it, whom he had corrupted by gifts and promises. Eryx is the highest Hill in Sicily except Aetna, situate between Panormus and Drepana, in that part of the Iland which lieth towards Italy, being more craggy toward Drepana. In the top thereof there is a Plaine whereon standeth the Temple of Venus, therefore called Erycina, the Richest in all Sicily, just under the Top of the Mount, in the midst of the Assent, is a City of the same name, very hard to be approached unto, the way to which with much difficulty is overcome by long and narrow passages from the foot of the Hill. L. Junius therefore well understanding the nature of the place, appointeth a strong guard both upon the Ridge of the Mountain, and likewise in the narrow passages below, being very safe himselfe, and having the advantage with much ease to repulse the Enemy. He also encompassed Ægisballus with a wall, and strengthened it with a Garrison of eight hundred men. But Carthalo landing his men there in the night time, stormed that Castle, and took and killed part of the Garrison souldiers, others escaped to Eryx.

The other passages concerning L. Junius are very doubtfully reported by Historians, some affirm he was taken by Carthalo at Ægisballus: Others, that he killed himselfe fearing to be condemned for the loss of his Navy. There is no less uncertainty whether the Secular sports were celebrated this year, or fourteen yeares after, when P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varus were Consuls. I think it more probable they were celebrated this year, the fear conceived from their late overthrowes, and hope of better fortune, inviting them thereunto, if their Religion were diligently performed. This was a very fruitfull year, inso much as twelve pound of oile was sold for an Assis; In the mean time the Dictatourship being expired, or Atilius having resigned it up, C. Aurelius L. F. C. N. Cotta, and P. Servilius L. F. C. N. Geminus were chosen Consuls. The Consuls were prettie successfull in Sicily, yet obtained no great Victory, nor reaped any great profit for the Common-wealth. They kept in the Carthaginians of Lilybanum and Drepanum, that they could make no large Excursions, nor so often as they had done, and took their Garrisons which were remote from the sea. Carthalo having made many attempts against them in vain, resolved at length to waste the Italian Coasts, that thereby he might divert the Consuls from Sicily; or if they refused to come back to succour their Country, depopulate their grounds, and take Cities. But fortune did not herein favour his designs. For the Prætor being sent out with the City-forces for defence of the Countrey, compelled him to return to Sicily without effecting his purpose.

Where when the Mercenaries mutinied for want of Pay, he exposed many of them in barren Ilands, and sent others to receive their Punishment at Carthage. The rest being incensed hereby, began manifestly to revolt, so that a new warre was feared from them: But Hamilcar who succeeded Carthalo, coming in season, set upon them in the night time, slew some, and drowned others; the remainder submitting themselves, and begging pardon he received into Grace. This is that Hamilcar surnamed Barcas, one of the best Commanders Carthage ever bred, and indeed without compare, but that Hannibal was his son. From this time the Warre began to be more difficult on the Romans side; For having suddenly appeased the Mercenaries, he sailed to Italy, and in very great compais spoiled the Locrian and Brunian Territories.

But the Romans having found the faith of Hiero King of Syracuse very constant toward them, and his merits great, freely remitted unto him that yearly Tribute they had in the former League compounded for, and made a perpetual band of friendship and society with him. In the interim Hamilcar being returned out of Italy landed in the Panormitan Grounds, and pitched his Camp between Panormus and Eryx, in a place by nature very strong, it is called Epeiræ, an Hill craggy and full of cliffs on all sides, exalting it self from the circumjacent Region to a very very great height. The top of it is not sharp, but continueth a plain of above an hundred furlongs, of a very profitable soil for the feeding of Cattel and bearing of Fruits, being open to the winds from sea, and void of all harmful and venomous creatures. Therein is a certain hillcock which supplieth the place of a Tower, from whence may be viewed all the grounds round about. Near it is a very convenient Haven for those that sail from Drepanus and Lilybæum to Italy, with store of fresh water. There are three wayes of ascending this Mount, two from the Land, one from the Sea, but all very difficult and full of obstructions. Here did Hamilear plant his Camp with much confidence having no confederate City near him, and being in the midst of his enemies: But trusting in the strength of the place and his own courage and skill in Marshal affairs, he found the Romans work enough, and very well settled the Carthaginian affairs, which now began to succeed well at home also. For another Carthaginian General, Hanno, who had a great emulation of Hamilear's Virtue, to obtain honour, and employ the Army without the Commonwealth's cost out of the enemies Country, invaded a port of Lybia about Hesatompylos, and having obtained the City, sent three thousand Hostages to Carthage; yet they had some alay of this their prosperity. For L. Caelius L. F. C. N. Metellus being the second time Consul, and Nun. Fabius M. F. M. N. Butto being his Colleague, a Navy was built at the charge of private men, which wasted the Coast of Africa. For though the Senate had again resolved against sending out of a Navy, yet at the Citizens request they gave leave to have one prepared, upon this condition, That they should safely restore those ships which were built at the publick Charge, reserving the prey to themselves; so that a Fleet was set out very considerable, which brought much terror and damage to the Coasts of Africa and assaulting Kings: Hippo, none of the meanest Cities, they fired the ships of Hippo and many buildings. In their return finding the mouth of the Haven chained up, by art and counsel they devised a way to explicate themselves out of present danger, for sailing with all the force they could, when they came near the Chain, all the men retired to the Stern, and so the Fore-Deck being lightened easily waisted over the Chain; then suddenly running to the Fore-Decks and depressing them, the Stern likewise slid over, and they had free liberty of sailing having delivered themselves from imminent danger.

After this escape, they fought with the Carthaginian Navy, and prevailed against them. The Roman Consuls divided their forces, L. Metellus besieged Lilybæum, and Nun. Fabius, Drepanum. Not far from Drepanum, toward the South, lyeth an Island, or rather a Rock, which the Grecians call Pelias, we Columbaria, which the Consul stormed in the night time, and slew the Carthaginian Garrison there. Hamilear, who came to defend Drepanum, made no delay, but at break of day set forth to recover the place again, which the Consul observing, being not able to relieve his own men, with his whole strength assaulted Drepanum, whereby drawing Hamilear from his design, he kept the Island in possession, and afterward made much advantage of it in besieging Drepanum, for he dammed up the sea, and joyned it to the Continent; and because the Walls of the City were weakest on that side, he there began his assaults. But the encounters between Hamilear, and these, and the Consuls of the following years, Polybius thinks impossible to be described because they were so many, and judgeth it unfit, lest it might give an occasion of the like. For Hamilear, having his Camp at Eptis for almost three years together, had almost daily encounters with the Romans, especially when their Camp being before Panormus was scarce five furlongs distant from the enemy. For neither did they refrain from skirmishing, having their Armies so near; Neither did they ever come to the trial of a main battel having many hinderances, especially because their forces being equal and their Camps alike strong, they were likewise on each side protected by the vicinity of their Camp, to which the party worsted might quickly retire. Hence it came to pass that as in fight some were alwayes slain, so when the battel declined they had a safe refuge to their Works. But while Drepanum was besieged, the Carthaginians Fleet infested not only the Sicilian but the Italian shores, and Hamilear plundering as far as he could, waisted the Italian territories even to Cuma. Many of the Romans Citizens being fallen into the Carthaginians power by these incursions, and the Sicilian fights, the Roman Commanders agreed with the Carthaginians for an exchange of Prisoners, which party received any overplus back, was to give two pound and an half of silver for an head, and the Carthaginians receiving more then the Romans paid down the money accordingly.

I find two Colonies planted in Italy this year, one at Asulum the other at Alifum. There was likewise a Lustration made at Rome (being the eight and thirtieth) by A. Atilius A. F. C. N. Calpurnius, and A. Manlius T. F. T. N. Atticus being Censors; and there were rated two hundred fifty one thousand, two hundred twenty two, whereas in the former Lustration there were found little less then three hundred thousand; so great a number of Citizens were consumed by War and Shipwracks. Nevertheless the Sicilian army was duly recruited, the supply being led by the Consuls M. Octavius C. F. M. N. Crassus (the second time Consul) and M. Fabius C. F. M. N. Licinus. These had a very busie and difficult warfare, but not being able to dispossesse Hamilear of his strong holds, they performed nothing memorable. Which happened likewise to the succeeding Consuls for the same reason, as likewise because new Generals (being on the sudden every year elected against an old experienced Commander) spent more time in making their preparations, chusing their ground, and insinuating themselves with the soldiery, diery, then was left for the management of Affairs. It was therefore this year concluded (when the time of assembling the people drew nigh) rather to chuse a Dictator then to recal either of the Consuls out of Sicily. Ti. Cornucianus Ti. F. Ti. Nepos was chosen to summon the Assembly; he nominated for Master of the Horse M. Fulvius Q. F. M. N. Flaccus. In the mean time the two Tribunes of the people, C. Fundanius and Ti. Sempronius appointed a day for Claudia the daughter of Appius Cacus to plead her cause before the people, being accused that returning from a Play, and her Chariot having no easie passage through the crowd of people, she let fall a wicked speech, Oh! that my brother were alive again and had Command of the Fleet.

There was hardly any Noble Family in Rome but had had some relation to the Claudians, either by Cognition or Affinity, so that she wanted not Patrons to defend her, declaring, The Nobility of her house, the merits of Appius her father, the frailty of her sex; that it was a thing unheard of for a woman to be called into Judgment: Neither was now the cause so great why a new custome should be begun against Claudia, which had not by any plot or practice offended the Majesty of the people; but only in a few words. On the contrary, the Tribunes alledged, What an impious and execrable speech she hath vented, ye are not ignorant, O Romans, neither is there any need of Witnesses, she her self confessing it; neither indeed can she deny it if she would, because she spoke openly and in publick, not reverencing either the Gods or the multitude of Citizens round about her. When therefore the crime is manifest, why should we doubt of the punishment? Have not the Laws made sufficient Provision? Or while we read the Letter of the Law, shall we suffer our minds to be deluded in the Sense of it. 'Tis objected, That it is unusual thus to accuse a woman; if it be so, why it is unusual likewise for a woman thus to offend: Neither hitherto did our Commonwealth ever afford so wicked and impudent a woman. And we wish that there were now no need of making a new Precedent, being desirous that (offences being avoided) the Law might lie hidden and quiet, rather then be made use of against the guilty with a profitable severity. But a City that intends its own establishment, must of necessity observe the Laws, which they of all men ought least to pervert who would be esteemed the Princes and Pillars of the Commonwealth; who being skilful in the Laws can not be ignorant, that though in most of them there be no mention expressly made of women yet in these words, If any One, and the like, both sexes are equally comprehended. What wonder is it then if we believe the Law against Treason to concern both sexes, seeing this very Claudia is an example that both sexes may offend against it? But they Extenuate the businesse, and would have the crime seem small, because it was only in Words. What? this yet was wanting; she did not join her endeavours, counsels and actions with the Carthaginians, she did not raise Troops, arme Slaves, seize on the Capitol, nor actually with her hands effect that wickedness against the City which in words she expressed; Notwithstanding this the Laws provide not only for the punishment of Deeds but of ill Counsels and designs also; if indeed a mad man or an infant do hurt to any, the Law layeth no hold on their actions: yet the mind and intentions of others in many causes is made as manifest by Words as by Deeds. She who made so detestable a wish, what would she have done if it had lain in her power to have brought it to pass? Unless we despise the Judgment of other men (which we have no reason to do) we shall find that in other places wicked wishes are accounted Crimes. At Athens, which for reputation of Wisdom exceedeth all Cities of Greece, there was a man whose office was to provide necessary accommodations for Funerals, condemned, because he wished he might make great gains, which could not be unless a great number of Citizens died: Yet those words might admit of a more favourable Interpretation. But Claudia plainly, and without any ambiguity wished Destruction to the Citizens, Overthrow to the whole Army, and Calamity to the whole Commonwealth. Would my Brother were alive again! A naughty wish it is, if she had made it only for her brothers sake; for why should life be restored to him by whose means so many Citizens lost their lives? who no lesse affronted the Commonwealth by his Arrogancy, then he did afflict it by his Rashness? who being by the votes of all men precondemned, avoided not the infamy of his judgment, but by accident escaped the punishment? Would you, if you were wise, have this man to live again, whose memory if you could hide in the same Grave with his ashes, it were your duty to do it? For as other Matrons do not vainly glory of the Egregious virtues and merits of their Brethren, so would he be a shame to you if any shame or modesty be left in you. But let a Noble Lady be pardoned, though perhaps foolishly she hath desired her brothers company, if she did it out of any pious and charitable consideration. Yea, clearly absolve her, if the cause of her wish be not more abominable then the wish it self foolish and insolent. For why did you wish your brother alive again? that you might be comforted with the countenance of a near Kinsman, that his labours might redound to your profit, his Authority be a protection to you, and his Honour a grace? None of all these. And what then? Even that he might command the Navy again: This, this, wicked wretch, was the reason why you desired, as much as in you lay, to raise the Dead, to reduce Nature to its former habit, and unlock the Cloisters of the Grave that you might find a man by whom we might be destroyed! This is the Woman, Romans, whose impunity is craved by those who while they approve themselves good Kinsmen, regard not though they be esteemed ill Citizens. And truly no man is against it, that (according to their desire) ye should have mercy mercy on her, had she had any mercy toward you. But seeing she hath wished the death of some, the grief of others, that they should be childless and fatherless, nay, the general calamity of all: who will be so foolishly tender as to judge her hostile, cruel, inhumane, not worthy of any mercy? What great lamentations and complaints were made when the Censors upon the last Lustration gave in the number of the Citizens? Though many things these years last past succeeded prosperously, yet good men thought the Commonwealth in no very safe or good condition by reason the number of the Citizens was so much decreased. But this woman nothing moved at the loss of those who perished, therefore only grieveth because any are remaining. She complaineth of the two great crowd in the City, she wisheth him alive by whose fault chiefly the number of Citizens is so small. But it may be said, The woman her self being indeed unworthy your mercy, will ye not yet pardon her crime for her Ancestors, for her Father's sake? Shall we then establish such a Law in our City, That if any man by any means do good to the Commonwealth his posterity shall have the liberty to offend it without punishment? Truly our Fathers were not of this Opinion, when they precipitated M. Manlius from the Rock, whereas the Capitol, the Romans last hope and refuge was, not by his Father or Grand-father or any of his Progenitors, but by himself defended from the Gauls. For saving or assisting the Commonwealth there ought no other reward to be required but the conscience of the fact: But Appius, if ever he did good to the Commonwealth received abundant reward, being much enriched and full of honour, in which state he continued flourishing even to his last old age. Though perhaps it were safer not to make any mention of Appius and the former Claudii, then to put you in mind of those injuries, very high and bold ones, which that Family (from its first Original never well affected to the people) hath committed against you. For what Appius is it they would have you remember, but him who alwayes with an enemies mind, crossing your designs, chose rather to perish with his Army then be saved by his Colleague, being a Plebeian? who against the will of all the Decrees and Tribes persisted in his Censorship beyond his due time? And now let them reckon up the merits of the Claudian Family, even from the time of the Decemviri, or from the first Original thereof, they shall find matter whereby to prove this woman like her Ancestors in pride and contumacy, rather then to make it appear she ought to be pardoned for their sakes. What cause therefore have these, or can any other man alledge why this woman ought to go unpunished, unless it be feared the City should loose a woman of so good example? of which opinion if ye also are, O Romans, keep her, keep Claudia amongst you, that when our Matrons kneel at the feet of the gods, supplicating them for the Commonwealth in time of trouble, she may hinder their devout Prayers by her Curses; that while they wish for Salvation for our Armies, she may wish Destruction; while they desire to see the soldiers return safe and sound, she may desire to hear they are vanquished, captivated and slain; that while they solicit the gods that few or none may fall in battel, she may repine and accuse Providence if any return home. Keep the woman, that as other Matrons provoke and encourage their children and kinsmen, in emulation of Illustrious men, to Virtue, Courage and Love of their Country, she may instruct hers by the example of P. Claudius to fight rashly, to run basely, wickedly to destroy the Citizens, and arrogantly to have the Commonwealth it self in contempt. Let her propound these things unto young Nobles to be resolved upon from their Infancy, to be practised in their Youth; so let those men be educated to whom you must hereafter commit the charge of your Navies and Armies.

Such speeches being frequently vented Pro and Con, the People assembling in judgement, condemned her, in a fine of five and twenty thousand pound of heavy brads. With this and other fines, T. Sempronius the Aedile built and dedicated the Temple of Liberty. After this M. Fabius M. F. M. N. Buto and C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bulbus were made Consuls. There was a Colonie this year planted at Fregena, a Maritime City of Etruria, nine miles from Alsum whither one was led two years since. These Consuls fought a very great Sea battel, the issue thereof was profitable to neither Party, for the Carthaginians lost a multitude of ships and men; And a tempest bereaved the Romans of their rich spoils: In Sicilia affaires were managed with the same advice, and the same fortune as the year before; The Romans having an hard task not onely by reason of the Cragginess of the places, but of Hamilcar his boldness and subtilty in martiall stratagems, whereby he so equally opposed the Romans, that he not onely defended what places he had possessed, and by frequent incursions vexed the Enemies associates both on the Sicilian and Italian Coasts; but minding other things also, did every where support the Carthaginian Power even ready to fall, being very industrious, of a resolute minde, and of excellent judgement in takeing seasonable Counsells. Desirous therefore to relieve the Lilybatans from fear and want, being more closely besieged by land, he commandeth part of his Navy to appear in the main sea, as steering their Course to Lilybæum, which while the Romans sailed out to Encounter, he slipped himself into the Haven, with some ships he had for that purpose placed where they could not be discovered, and so strenghtned and encouraged the besieged with his presence, and abundance of provisions which he brought. While the war was in this manner continued in Sicilia, A. Manlius T. F. T. N. Torquatus Atticus and C. Sempronius T. F. T. N. Blasus being againe Consuls, came and tooke charge of the Army. About this time the manner of their war was changed, not so much as ordered more closely and in narrower bounds. The Romans (as hath been already declared) had planted a Garrison above the City Eryx upon the Top of the Mountaine, another below at the foot of the Hill. The natural strength and situation of the place, with the helpe of these guards, seemed sufficient to secure that City from fear of any surprize. But the boldness and Valour of Hamilcar, making any thing possible, which he list to undertake, in a very short time reduced it into his Power. For he in the night time, setting forward with his forces, and without noise ascending thirty furlongs up the Hill, himself marching in the head of the party, surprized the Romans unawares, and having slaine greatest part of those he found in the Towne, he sent the rest to Drepanum. From this time the face of things was very strange, and the warfare very hard and severe, for Hamilcar being now in the midst of two of the Enemies Garrisons, was himself besieged by them below while he besieged those above; both the Romans and the Carthaginians undergoing incredible paynes and danger, did for almost two years next insueing performe the office of most Valiant souldiers; For the Camps being so neare there passed not a day, nay scarce an houre without alarmes and skirmishes, neither party all this while fainted or yielded, neither did Victory or overthrow part them; but still they continued, equall and unvanquished, designeing in the mean time to prosecute the Warre at Sea also.

This year a Colonie was planted at Brundisium, in the Salentine Territories, twenty yeares after that Countrey was subdued by the Romans. About this time T. Cornucianus, who was the first High Priest of the Plebeians, died in a great old age, and in his place succeeded L. Caelius Metellus. The next Consuls were C. Fundanius C. F. Q. N. Fundulus, and C. Sulpicius C. F. Ser. N. Gallus. By them the war with Hamilcar was managed in the same manner, and with the same fortune as before, onely the Mercenary Gaules, and others who kept Garrison in Eryx, being discontented for want of Pay, and other injuries, endeavour'd to betray the City to the Romans, but not being able to effect it, they revolted to the Consuls, and these were the first Forreigners the Romans ever entertained into society of Armes. Notwithstanding this access of strength, they were not able by their Land-forces to finish the War, chiefly by reason of Hamilcars virtue, who could neither be circumvented by craft, nor vanquished by Force.

Once more therefore they consulted about setting forth another Navy to Sea; For by no other meanes could the Carthaginians be kept from Sicily, unless they were mastered by Sea. And they were much encouraged in their resolution, by reason of their former success, when the Navy was set forth at the cost of private men: But money was wanting, the Treasury being long ago exhausted with the charge of a continuall War. Then did the Noble Roman Spirit seasonably relieve the wants of the Common-wealth. In Carthago were the Scuatores, that in a time of publick danger they scorned to spare their private purses, out of which on the sudden more money was raised then the building of a Navy required. Those who were richest did every man undertake to build a Quinquereme, setting it forth compleatly manned and arm'd; others according to their estates joyned two or three together in the same design, upon this condition, that when the Common-wealth was restored to a better Condition, every man's money should be paid back again. By this meanes two hundred ships of five Oares on a side were made ready, according to the pattern of that Gally they had taken from Hanniball Rhodius. Great was now the expectation of all men, for being put to their last refuge, they resolved with this Navy of Necessity to hazard the Fortune of the whole War. While these thing were in doing, C. Lutatius C. F. C. N. Catulus, and A. Posthumus A. F. L. N. Albinus entered the Consulship. A. Posthumus was then Priest of Mars, and therefore when he desired to cast lots for his Province, L. Metellus the High Priest would not suffer him, pronouncing it unlawfull for a Priest to depart from the place of his Office, and leave the Ceremonies unperformed, which was likewise allowed of, and agreed upon by succeeding Generations. The Senate likewise at the same time shewed a like Example of defending their Countrey's Religion, for they forbad C. Lutatius the Consul to ask counsell at Preneste, and manage the Affaires of the Common-wealth by direction of outlandish Auguries. Then intending their minds upon the War (because both the Consuls could not be spared with safety of their Religion, and one seemed not sufficient to bear the whole burthen) they ordained one of the Prætors (this being the first year wherein they began to create two) to accompany C. Lutatius and it fell to the Lot of Q. Valerius Falto. These gathering together all the Publick and private ships, to the number of three hundred, with Ferry-boats, and other Vessells to the number of seven hundred, as soon as Winter was over, sailed to Sicily, whither being come, they find both the Lilybanan and Drepanitan Havens open for them; For the Enemy not expecting any Navy from Italy, were returned to Africa with all their ships. The Consul animated with this prosperous beginning, being by nature full of spirit, hating Idleness, and desirous of Action, besieged Drepanum, raising Workes against it; in the mean time not omitting to train up his Sea-souldiers, daily exercising them (as foreseeing sudden use of them in fight) insomuch as they who were utterly ignorant of Maritime Affaires and chances, seemed sufficiently prepared for any Encounter.

The City of Drepanum being fiercely assaulted both by Sea and land, and now reduced even to the utmost danger, part of their Wall being battered to the ground; It chanced that the Consuls Consull Valiantly fighting in the head of his men, received a deep wound in his thigh; whereupon his Souldiers troubled at his fall, and running in to him, missed the opportunity of taking the place, when it was even almost in their hands: Before the Consull had recovered the use of his foot, newes was brought of a great Carthaginian Navy approaching, to the number of four hundred ships, stored with provision for their Army, with a very great strength of souldiers, and abundance of Armes and Money. Hanno, a Carthaginian Noble Man, was Commander in Chiefe; his chiefe care was to get safe to Eryx, ease his ships of their burden, and so manning them with stout Souldiers from Hamilcar, to return and fight the Roman Navy. His design was well contrived, but prevented by the wisdom and circumspection of C. Lutatius the Consull, who knew it would be of great moment to the Victory, to encounter the Carthaginians while their ships were heavy laden, and encombred with the burthen of their own provisions. Therefore upon the Ides of March, filling his ships with choice souldiers, he saileth to the Islands Egates, over against Lilybaeum, where he discovereth Hanno coming from Hierosus; then encouraging his Sea-men and souldiers he appointeth next day for the fight: But at break of day he began to doubt, because the wind was arisen favourable to the Carthaginians, and contrary to himselfe. Weighing then the Reasons on both sides, he thought it safer to fight with the winds, and Hanno while he was alone, and had his ships laden, then suffer him to pass by to unlade his ships, and bring back into battell the flower of their foot Army, and also Hamilcar himselfe, who at that time was very formidable. Observing therefore the Enemies ships as they passed by with full saile, he setteth forth out of the Haven, and to encourage his men, causeth himselfe to be carried into the Admirall-Gally, having not recovered the use of his limbe: signe of battell being given on both sides, Q. Valerius performed the Office of Generall, by reason of C. Lutatius his infirmity, not suffering to supply the place. The fight lasted not long before it plainly appeared on which side the Victory inclined; for the Roman ships being light and nimble, did on every side, at their pleasures assault the Carthaginians, being heavy and almost immoveable; they were likewise in every thing else superiours, being taught by experience to avoid and amend whatsoever heretofore they had found inconvenient; and harmefull; Their ships were built after the best fashion, they had carefully laid aside all lumber which was of no use in fight, their Rowers were lusty, and well trained up, and they had a very considerable strength of Legionaries; All these were very great advantages toward the Victory. On the other side, the Carthaginian ships were heavy with burden, their Rowers newly leaved, and their men negligent, as being in security; for they had hoped the Romans would no more have tried their fortune at Sea. Therefore, as it must needs be, where the difference is so great, the Victory was not long in obtaining, the Carthaginians lost an hundred and twenty ships, seventy whereof were taken, with all the men, the remainder escaped, the rest upon a happy change of winde in the time of fight, escaped to Hierosus. This was that famous battell at the Islands Egates, as it is chiefly described by Polybius.

For other writers affirm, that seventy three ships were taken, an hundred and twenty five sunke, two and thirty thousand men taken prisoners, and thirteen thousand slain, the Prizes taken were very great, not only in Provisions and Armes, but in gold and silver also. Of the Roman Navy twelve ships were lost. 'Tis reported that from the beginning of the fight a fiery meteor was seen in the aire, threatening as it were the Carthaginian Navy with it's point directed against it, presignifying the event which presently ensued. Hanno, with the rest of the ships which escaped out of the Fight, except those which fled to Lilybaeum, returning to Carthage, was put to death for this his Misfortune. C. Lutatius the Consull went to the Army before Lilybaeum, where, while his wound was in curing, he spent his time in taking an account of the ships, and Captives, and ordering how they should be dismissed. Thence he went to Eryx, where he fought Hamilcar with good successe, having slain two thousand Carthaginians. The Carthaginians at home understanding what a great Overthrow they had received, though their Spirits were great, yet found that they wanted strength and meanes, to renew and carry on the War. For they were not able, so long as the Romans were Masters at sea, to supply their Army at Eryx with necessary accommodations; and, if that Army miscarried, they knew not where to raise any more souldiers, or find a Generall they durst confide in. Being by this Necessity driven into despair, they sent to Hamilcar, empowering him with full Commission to do what he himself should think fit or convenient for the Republick: He having hitherto performed the Office of an excellent Generall, did now no less behave himselfe as a good Citizen. For having duely and seriously considered all arguments on both sides, when he found there was no other means but Peace, whereby to preserve the Common-wealth, he sent Embassadors to the Consull to treat with him thereabout. The mention of Peace was not unwellcome to the Consull, for being now shortly to lay down his Office, he could not by any meanes hope for the obtaining of a greater Glory, then that, of having finished the War, and to transmit that to his successor which was in his own power to accomplish, and most properly belonged to him, he thought both unreasonable and unadvised. He was the more forward, as being very well conscious of the wants of the Common-wealth, and that he thought it fit his Countrey, after so many years continuall labour, should enjoy some rest. Wherefore after a long dispute of Articles on both sides, it was agreed, that the Carthaginians should totally depart Sicily; that they should not wage war against Hiero, and the Syracusans; or any of their Associates; that they should forthwith without ransom restore all Captives, and deliver up all Runagadoes; that they should in the space of twenty years, by equal portions, pay two thousand and two hundred Euboican Talents of pure silver: That the confederates of each party might live secure and unmolested; That neither party should exercise any command, or make any publick building, or raise any souldiers within the others jurisdiction, nor admit the others associates into friendship and confederacy.  But it could by no means be obtained (though the Consul earnestly insisted upon it) that the souldiers within Eryx should resign up their Armes; Hamilcar protesting, That he would rather sacrifice himself and his country to destruction, then yield to such a disgrace: Nevertheless he condescended, That every man at his departure thence should pay eighteen pence. Hereupon messengers were sent both by the Consul and the Carthaginians to inform the Senate and People of the Conditions agreed upon. The people did not allow of the peace, but sent ten Delegates to take an exact account of all circumstances, who being returned, they heightened the Conditions, That the Carthaginians should presently lay down a thousand Talents, and within ten years after pay two thousand two hundred, that they should clearly quit not only Sicily, but all other Islands between that and Italy, that they should not sail in a long ship either into Italy or any of the Romans Islands, nor hire any souldier from thence.

 The Carthaginians, so they might have peace, refused nothing; Hamilcar, before the Articles were sworn unto, laid down his Command and went to Lilybæum, and from thence to Carthage, having approved himself, without comparision, the most excellent of all their Generals in that War, both in Courage and in Counsel. After this manner was managed and finished the first Carthaginian War, which lasted for four and twenty years with various chances and great losses, but to the greater damage of them who at last proved Victors. For they who have made a particular Account, report about five hundred Carthaginian ships to have been lost, and seven hundred of the Romans; which is a great argument of the Romans Constancy and Resolution, that, not regarding so many losses by fight, or shipwracks sustained, they did yet with patience bear and overcome the power of their Enemy, the frowns of Fortune, the tedious labour and pains, and the poverty of their Treasury.

 After this the Government of C. Lutatius the Consul was prorogued, that he might settle affairs in Sicily; thither likewise was sent his brother one of the new Consuls, Q. Lutatius C. F. C. N. Cerco, whose Colleague was A. Manlius T. F. T. N. These did by their wisdom order the Dracenis, and settled all things in peace and quiet, deciding all controversies and taking away all causes of quarrels and tumults; which after so great motions and alterations were unavoidably remaining. They disarmed all the Sicilians who adhered to Hamilcar, as likewise the Gauls who had revolted from him; furthermore the Gauls were commanded to depart out of the Roman Empire; because, besides other offences, when they were in the Garrison on the top of Mount Eryx, they plundered the Temple of Venus. The Sicilian Cities according to their several abilities were forced to pay Tribute and Custom; and it was made a Province, whither a Pretor was sent to command and govern yearly.

 In the mean time Embassadors came from Carthage to intreat, They might redeem their Captives, and by Order from the Senate they were all restored without Ransome, as many as were in Publick custody; they who were prisoners to private men were redeemed at a certain rate, the greater part whereof was by command of the Senate paid out of the Treasury. But unlucky accidents at home did much diminish the joy of the Roman people. The River Tiber did this year flow higher then ordinary, and filled all the lower parts of the City with large Pools of Water. Many buildings were by the first force thereof washed to the ground, and others, having their foundation rotted (for the Inundation continued many dayes) after the fall of the water, did much decay.

 After this there happened a greater calamity by Fire, which suddenly beginning in the night time, and running through many streets of the City, destroyed an incredible multitude of houses and men; and, not content with private harmes, consumed all the buildings in the whole Circumference of the Forum. At length it seized upon the Temple of Vesta, but then L. Cecilius the Chief Priest, seeing the Holy things and secret Pledges of the Roman Empire to be in danger, behaved himself worthy of his Office, for he leaped into the midst of the fire without any care of himself, so he might but rescue the Holy things which the Virgins had forsaken and left behind them, which accordingly he performed. Himself having his Arme half burnt and his Eye-sight spoiled, beside the comfort he received from his good act, was eminently rewarded by the people of Rome, who Decreed, That as often as he went to the Senate he should be carried in a Chariot, which from the Foundation of the City was never granted to any man before.

In the mean time Q. Lutatius the Consul, with his brother Catulus and Q. Valerius the Proprætor, having settled affairs in Sicily returned home to the City and made each of them them their Triumph; C. Lutatius Catulus on the fourth of the Nones of October, and Q. Valerius on the day before the Nones of the same moneth. There was a memorable strife between these two concerning the Triumph of Valerius; for Lutatius his Triumph being without dispute agreed upon, Q. Valerius contending that his pains and labour were equal in the Victory desired the like honour as he had undergone the like care and danger. Catulus on the other side alledged, That the lesser authority should not be equalized with the greater in the distribution of honours.

The question being hotly argued, Q. Valerius challenged Catulus to stand to arbitration, Whether or no the Carthaginian Navy were not overcome by his conduct? Catulus refused not to answer him; whereupon Atilius Calatinus was chosen Arbitrator, who asked Valerius, Whether the Consul's authority or the Pretors ought to have prevailed in case they had dissented in their consultation about fighting? and in case their Auguries had been different whether of the two ought to have been followed? To which when Valerius answered, That in both cases the Consul's authority ought to have prevailed above the Pretors; Calatinus not expecting till Catulus spake, passed sentence on his side. But Q. Valerius, though he was cast by the judgment of the Arbitrator, did yet obtain liberty to Triumph, his virtue and courage having been very famous in that War. This year C. Aurelius Costa, and M. Fabius Buteo being Censors, made the nine and thirtieth Lustration. There were numbered two hundred and threescore thousand Citizens; two Tribes being superadded, the one called Voluna the other Quirina, the number of Tribes was made up five and twenty, and so continued. Sicily being now wholly subdued, as much as belonged to the Carthaginians, and peace with them concluded, all things seemed not only quiet but very safe and secure; when behold a sudden war, arising from whence it was least feared, did for a few dayes astonish all Italy both with the terror and fear of an intestine broil, as likewise with wonder at the speedy dispatch and issue of it.

The Falisci, I know not upon what account, grew so mad as to rise up in arms against the Romans; but the Consuls being sent with the Legions quelled them within six dayes, and reduced them to subjection. In the former battel, for 'tis reported two were fought, the Victory was doubtful, for their force prevailed though their horse were routed. But in the latter the victory being on the Romans side complete, caused the Falisci to humble themselves and beg peace, having lost fifteen thousand men: upon their yielding they were fined with the losse of their arms, horse, household-stuffe, servants and half their Territories. Their City in whose strength they confided, was translated from a craggy difficult place into plain open ground. The people of Rome were meditating a more severe revenge, out of anger against a City which had so often rebelled; but restraining their wrath by the advice of Papirius (who had written the form of submission by the Consuls own command) they chose to spare the City, but the Faith of the Romans: And so much did the sacred name of Publick Faith prevail with them all, that they adjudged the conquered party to no severer punishment then was agreed upon. This war gave occasion to have this year ended with the Triumphs of the Consuls; Q. Lutatius Triumphed on the Calends of March over the Falisci, A. Manlius the fourth of the Nones of March.

Taly being now once more at Peace within it selfe, their Publick Pleasures, and Delights did likewise encrease with their Power and security. When the Roman Games were exhibited, G. Claudius A. P. F. C. N. Centus, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. Tullianus being Consuls, L. Livius Andronicus, in imitation of the Græcians Comedies and Tragedies, reduced the Stage Plays, which heretofore were onely Satyrs into Fables, and feigned representations. The same year likewise beganning to encrease in wealth, On the fourth of the Calends of May, the Floralia were instituted out of the Sabina books, to avert the blasting of fruits and plants then springing forth. L. and M. Publicius Mægalus Brothers and Aduiles of the People did exhibit publick shows out of the Fines raised from Herdsmen who had fed their Cattel on Commons. The Magistracy of these Brethren was in another respect very memorable; in that they caused that Cliff (which from them received the name of Publicius) to be made plain and even, for the more commodious passage of Carriages into Mount Aventine, whereas before the Rock in that place was craggie and almost impassable. They likewise built the Temple of Flora in the great shew-place.

These things were acted at home, while all things were quiet abroad, onely there was a suspicion that the Gauls and Ligurians had a designe for War. That these Provinces therefore were assigned to the Consuls, and war then commenced with the Gauls, is rather a Conjecture, then a true History, there being no antient writer extant which accurately describes those things; This one thing is Certain, that a Latine Colonie was planted at Spolegium in Umbria. The next year also 'tis easier to say, there was no Peace because the Temple of Janus was not shut, then to declare where or with what successe the war was managed. And the Consulship of Q. Mamilius Q. F. Q. N. and Q. Valerius Q. F. P. N. is hardly known by any other passage then that Ennius the first Elegant Roman Poet was that year borne. But the year after, when Ti. Sempronius Ti. F. C. N. Gracchus and P. Valerius Q. F. P. N. Falto were Consuls, the Gallick wars brake out again, and the Ligurians a new Enemy, were then first invaded by a Roman Army. This Province fell to the lot of T. Sempronius. P. Valerius encountered the Gauls, at the first with ill success, having lost three thousand five hundred men: But, entering fight again he obtained a signall Victory, wherein fourteen thousand Gauls were slain, and two thousand taken. But, by reason of the loss sustained in the former battell, the Consul was denied the honor of Triumph, especially seeing his prosperous fight was rather to be attributed to the Fortune of the Common-wealth, then to his wise management of the business. For after the first fight, understanding that assistance was coming to him from Rome, he said, he had rather perish with all his Army, then obtain Victory by the helps of others; and in this fury he cast himselfe and the Roman Army into the hazard of a battell. T. Gracchus had better and more happy success, for having overthrown the Enemy in a set battell, he depopulated great part of Liguria; From thence he crossed over into Sardinia and Corfica, and bringing back a vast multitude of Captives, gave occasion to that proverb of Sardi Venales, whereby is signified any thing that is plentiful, and at an underrate to be sold.

But

But to confess the truth, the Romans had at this time rather a good opportunity than a just cause of possessing Sardinia and Corfica. The Carthaginians after the Sicilian Peace, were involved in a very troublesome war with their Mercenaries, and reduced even to the utmost extremity; whereupon other their Hirelings, who were in a Garrison in Sardinia, slew Bostar the Carthaginian General with all his men: Hanno being sent from Carthage to punish their Villany, they inveigled his Army into a society of Rebellion, and apprehending him, nailed him to the Cross, and having slain all the Carthaginians, they had possessed almost all the strong holds throughout the Island, till upon a falling out between them and the Sardinians, they were expelled the Island, and betook themselves into Italy. Then did they accomplish that which while they were in Sardinia they could not, for at that time they had invited the Romans to the Dominion of that Island: But being now present either by the importunity of their Entreatys, or by plainly demonstrating what an occasion was offer'd of encreasing the Roman Power, they prevailed with them to sail over into Sardinia. For it is a virtue of no ordinary strain, to abstain from other mens goods when they may with ease be possessed, neither can covetous or ambitious men well or long dissemble their greedy desires: But 'twill not be amiss for the better understanding of this business, to relate some foregoing circumstances. The Romans, that they might gain the Reputation of Humanity, did in the beginning of this Warre, very much favour the Carthaginian cause. And, though they sent them no assistance as was desired, yet they refused to entertain the Uticans, or any others who revolted to them: They commanded their Merchants out of Sicily and Italy to accommodate the Carthaginians with all necessary Provisions, prohibiting all traffick with their Enemies; and gave licence of hiring men out of Italy for this war. They sent likewise Embassadors, though in vaine, to compose the strife: A little before there arose a controversie, because the Carthaginians had taken some Italian Merchants conveighing Commodities to the Enemy, and secured them in publick Prisons, and they had now five hundred of them in chains, and having slain not a few, had cast them into the sea to prevent the discovery of the thing; whereupon the Romans declared themselves agrieved, and began to threaten War: But the Carthaginians restoring those whom they had in custody, so pacified the Romans, that they in answer sent back without Ransom all other Prisoners taken in the Sicilian war. Yet at length Ambition prevailed, with a desire to crush that People, with whom they had for four and twenty yeares together waged war with various success, and foresaw, that unless in time they prevented it, they must be forced to fight again. Wherefore when the Carthaginians, (having against their wills lost Sardinia, and now finished their war with the Mercenaries) meditated Revenge upon the Authors of Rebellions and Revolts, the Romans laid hold of this occasion, and decreed, that War should be proclaimed against Carthage, unless they laid down their Arms, which they first refused, promising to assist their Rebels, but indeed and really against the Romans. Whereupon the Carthaginians unwilling in an unreasonable time to undertake so great a War, did not only quit Sardinia, but upon the Romans demand, added likewise twelve hundred Talents of silver, to their former fine. This injury did most of all incense the minds of the Carthaginians, and is thought to be the only cause of that war which was soon after commenced, and prosecuted by Hanniball. For Hannibals constant Hatred of Romans (to which the second Punique war is chiefly imputed) was not by any other means more hotly exasperated, or strongly fomented. But these things happened afterwards.

In the mean time L. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Claudinus, and Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flaccus being made Consuls had Gaul on this side the Po for their Province. That a Colonie was this year planted at Valentia, though many affirm it is no constant and general opinion, unless there be another Valentia besides Vibo, which Authors of better credit affirm to have been peopled fifty years after in the Consulship of Quintus Flaminius and Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus. The Consuls in Gallia, while they kept their forces united, had a safe and prosperous Expedition, but after they had divided their Legions out of greediness to waste more places, the Camp of M. Fulvius was in the night time assaulted and very hardly defended. The Gauls departing without effecting their design, did afterward return with greater terror having their forces much augmented. For the prime men of the Boii taking counsel secretly together, raised a vast power of *Transalpin*es against the Romans. In the mean time L. Lentulus the Consul, who had marched with his Army into the Ligurian Territories, obtained there a great victory. It was ordered therefore he should make a Triumph, which accordingly he did on the Intercalary Ides. Some Authors report, That these Consuls were the first who led the Roman army over the Po, and that in divers fights were slain four and twenty thousands, and taken five thousands of the Ligurians and Insubrian Gauls. But I rather believe, that the Po was crossed over and the Insubrians first encountred in their own Country in the next Gallick commotion. About this time Embassadors were sent to Ptoleme King of Egypt to profer him assistance in his wars against Antiochus and the Syrians; The King returned thanks, telling them withall, That he had now no need of assistance inasmuch as the quarrel was compounded. After this Hiero came to Rome to the great joy of the Romans, who entertained him with all the respect as befitted them to do, being a confederate Prince, having deserved much of them, and a companion in their greatest Victory. He bestowed on the people of Rome two hundred thousand Bushels of Wheat; he came to behold the sports which were prepared against next year.

For according to some Authors the secular Sports were celebrated in the Consulship of P. Cornelius

- Fasti Capitolini 417. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caudinus and C. Licinius P. F. P. N. The Masters of the Revells were M. Aemilius M. F. & M. Livius M. F. M. N. Salinator. In the mean time the Boian Princes, confiding in the multitude of Auxiliaries they had from beyond the Alpes, sent to the Consuls demanding, That Ariminum with it's Territories, which without doubt of right belonged to the Gauls, should be restored them, otherwise a terrible and destructive War would ensue. The Consuls, having not drawn their forces together, durst not hazard those few they had in the fortune of a Battel, neither could they consent unto the Gauls their demand, they answered therefore, They should send Embassadors to the Senate, to signifie their minds. The Gauls accepted of the condition, and a truce was concluded on for some days, while the Embassadors could go and return again. The Ambassadors at Rome received a denial from the Senate, and greater preparations were made for this War, whereof there was afterward no use, in asmuch as Fortune without the expence of Roman blood put an end to it. While the Embassadors returned, the Boians fought a set Battel with their Transalpine Auxiliaries, upon this Occasion; The Auxiliaries without the knowledge of the Boian people, had marched as far as Ariminum, whence a suspicion arose, that their maine Errand was to possess that Territory themselves; the Boians therefore were so enraged, that having slain their Kings Ates and Galatus as Traitors, they endeavoured by force to expell these strangers out of their Land, whereupon a Battell was fought with much slaughter, and both sides being thereby much weakened; the Transalpines returned home, the Boians bought their Peace of the Romans with part of their Grounds. This war being so quickly dispatched, the Consuls went into Liguria: where P. Lentulus, having in a set Battel Overthrown the Enemy, led his Army through the whole Region, taking Castles, some by storme, some by composition. C. Licinius intending to saile over into Corfica, not having boats enough to transport his whole Army, sent M. Claudius Glycias before, with a Party; who, being vainly arrogant, when he saw that the Corficans were terrified at his coming, without any respect to the Consull by whose direction he was sent, or consideration of his own office and duty, made a league with them, upon certain Conditions, in his own Name; thinking thereby to attain unto himselfe the Glory of having reduced that Island. But the Consull following with the Residue of the Army, forbore not to prosecute them with armes (notwithstanding they alledged in their own behalfe the Claudian Peace) till he brought them into subjection. The Senate to clear the Commonwealth from the Imputation of Breach of Faith; ordered Glycias the Authour of that dishonourable peace, to be delivered up into the hands of the Corficans; and they refusing to take him, he was put to death in the Common Gaole. This year were Censours L. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caudinus & Lutatius C. F. C. N. Cerco, who made no Lustration because Cerco died in his Censourship. For all Claudius was delivered up to the Corficans, and then executed as a Malefactor, yet the Barbarians could not by any means be perswaded, that the Roman war afterward was just against them. Their minds therefore being agrieved with the memory hereof were easily tempted to break out in armes, in imitation of their neighbour Island Sardinia. For the Carthaginians by secret promises had incited the Sardinians to Rebellion, who readily entertained the motion, as not too much hating their old Masters, nor loving their new ones.
- This news being brought to Rome, filled the City both with fear and indignation, not that they much regarded Sardinia; but because they perceived the Carthaginian war would break out again; which because they believed the sooner it was begun would prove the easier; (The Carthaginians having not well recovered themselves since the last war) they resolved to prepare themselves, and commence it as soon as might be. The Carthaginians, willing at that time to endure any thing rather than a Roman war, were hereupon so terrified, that having once and again sent Embassadors in vaine, they did at length send ten of their Prime Nobility, most humbly entreating, That they might enjoy the Peace they had obtained. Nevertheless they could not receive any mild Answer; till Hanno the youngest among the Embassadors, but of an undaunted mind, and a free tongue, replied, If you are preptorily determined to deny us that Peace which we have bought, not for a year or two, but for ever, at least restore us our price we gave you, Sicily and Sardinia: In private contracts 'tis no honest man's part, when the bargain is made void, to receive his Commodities back, and not return the money laid down for them. Then the Romans, being ashamed to seem the Authors of an unjust war, dismissed the Embassadors with a better Answer. So one of this yeares Consuls C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bulbus (now the second time Consull) remained in Italy, the other, T. Manlius T. F. T. N. went according to his lot into Sardinia. He, in many places encountering the Enemy with good success, appealed the whole Island, subdued the Sardinians, and triumphed over them the sixth of the Ides of March.
- These things being accomplished, and the Roman Armes laid down, as having no Enemy, the Temple of Janus was shut; an unusuall sight in Rome, and not seen, after the dayes of Numa, for the space of about four hundred and forty yeares. In which respect I account the City of Rome very unhappy, that being perpetually employ'd in great and difficult labours, could never obtain the fruits thereof. For, whereas no wife man wagheth war but to procure Peace, this City after so many and great warres happily finished, sometimes could not obtain: but never could long keep Peace. For even then new Rumours of War, after a few moneths, were heard of

of, which bereaved them of the sweetness of that Peace, which they had scarce well tasted of. The Sardinians, who had lately been subdued, shake off the yoke, and the Corsicans brake out in Rebellion, and the Ligurians raised Tumults, even in Italy it self. Therefore L. Posthumius A.F. A.N. Albius and Sp. Carvilius Sp. F. C. N. Maximus being Consuls had order to levy new Armies, which being disposed of in three bodies to prevent the enemies from helping out the other. L. Posthumius assailed the Ligurians, Sp. Carvilius the Corsicans, and P. Cornelianus was designed for Sardinia. This Island being of a very unwholesome aire affected his Army with the Plague and other diseases, whereby many mortals with the Pretor also himself perished. Hereupon the Sardinians grew bold and high, but were soon quelled after the arrival of Sp. Carvilius in a great set battel; the Corsicans were likewise subdued by him. For which exploits it was decreed he should Triumph, as he did on the Calends of April. In Liguria likewise affairs succeeded well by the management of the other Consul with his Army. At Rome Turia one of the Vestal Virgins being condemned of Incest which she had lately committed with a slave, slew her self with her own hands. After this C. Attilius A.F. A.N. Balbus A. Posthumius A.F. A.N. Albius being Censors, made the fortieth Lustration. 'Tis probable the number of Citizens was this year lesse then heretofore (though I find not the number recorded) because the Censor, in order to the increase of Citizens, compelled every man to swear That he would marry for the Procreation of children. This year Cn. Nevius a Campanian who had received pay in the Carthaginian war, did first add Fables to his Scenes. In the mean time the Ligurians and Sardinians again rebelling, were allotted Provinces to the new Consuls; Q. Fabius Q.F. Q.N. Maximus Verrucolus managed the Ligurian War, M. Pompilius M.F. M.N. Marbo the Sardinian; whereas it was reported That the Carthaginians were the cause of this commotion, by private messengers stirring up the Barbarians to Rebellion. There were Embassadors sent to Carthage with very harsh instructions, To require the tribute due, to command them to abstain from all Islands under the Roman jurisdiction, adding threat of war unless they performed what was required at their hands.

The Carthaginians had now since their former calamities gathered strength and courage chiefly by the industry of Hannibal, who did not only reduce those who had revolted in Africa, but had farther extended the Empire. They had likewise by his conduct acquired great Dominions in Spain. Wherefore they answered the Embassadors roughly enough to all particulars, but when they, according to their instructions, propounded to the Carthaginians a Spear and a Caduceus, offering them their choice of which they pleased, they answered, That they would choose neither, but would accept of which soever the Legates should think fit to leave behind. Henceforward a cruel hatred began to burn between these two people, but neither party being willing as yet to commence the war, they continued in a show of friendship, rather because they did not fight, then that the peace was firm.

Both the Consuls, returning to Rome and declaring what they had done, obtained leave to Triumph. Q. Fabius had slain many Legions in battel, and had compelled the rest to contain themselves upon the Alpes, and made the skirts of Italy secure from their plundrings. He Triumphed over the Ligurians on the Calends of February. Upon the Ides of March afterwards M. Pompilius Triumphed over the Sardinians, whom he had overcome. Nevertheless the Sardinians did not abstain from War, but being by their losses rather incensed then broken, they renewed the Rebellion with much greater strength. Therefore both the Consuls, M. Amilius M.F. M.N. Lepidus and M. Publicius L.F. L.N. Mallonius were sent into Sardinia: they gathered together great store of plunder and spoil in that Island, which when they carried over with them into Corsica they utterly lost, the Islanders there taking it from them. At home likewise there were very vehement tumults at this time, for C. Flaminius Tribune of the people propounding an Agrarian Law, That the Picene and Gallick grounds which belonged to the Senones should be equally divided amongst the people. The Senate opposed it, and not being able to persuade the Tribune by entreaties or threats, at length gave order to the Magistrates to raise an Army for defence of the Commonwealth. Flaminius could not yet be drawn from his resolution, obstinate against all force, and inexorably by intreaties. His father likewise admonished him To submit himself to the will of the Senate, and not be esteemed an author of sedition. But he still persisting in his design, called an Assembly, intending to recite the Law. But then his father Flaminius in grief and anger came to the Pulpit, and taking his son by the hand pulled him away.

A wonderful Example was there shewn with what Piety and Reverence all men held esteem of the power of a Father: For he who had contemned the indignation and cruel threats of the whole Senate, now in the heat of work, in the view of all the Roman people, to whom the Constitution of Law would have been most acceptable, suffered himself by the hand of one only old man to be drawn down from the higher place. The Modesty of the Assembly in this business is not to be forgotten, who though they saw all their hopes frustrated by the Tribune's departure, did not by the least murmur signify their discontent at his fathers action. But the Law was by this means rather deferred then avoided. C. Carvilius the other Tribune assiling his Colleague, this as it caused corruption of manners amongst the Commons, so it gave beginning to that most grievous Gallick war which brake out the eighth year after the division of the grounds.

After this M. Pomponius M. F. M. N. Maior, and C. Papirius C. F. L. N. Maf, being Consuls, had for their Provinces M. Pomponius Sardinia, and C. Papirius Corsica. In both places the Enemies gave back, betaking themselves into woods and craggy Mountains, defending themselves more by the situation of Places than by Arms. Therefore M. Pomponius seeing it more hard to find the Enemy, then to overcome him, caused hounds to be brought him out of Italy, who by their scent conducted him to the men, whom he surprized like wild beasts in their dens and kennells. C. Papirius, having overcome the Corsicans, pursued them into the mountains, where both his labour and danger was very great, and many of his souldiers perished either by thirst, or by the sudden incursion of the Enemy, till having found water and refreshed his Army, the Corsicans fearing the issue hearkned to the Consul's counsel of submitting themselves.
- While the Consuls were detained by these Employments, a General Assembly was called by M. Duilius M. F. M. N. who was made Dictator for that purpose; he nominated C. Aurelius L. F. C. N. Cora for Master of the horse; there were likewise Censours T. Manlius T. F. T. N. Torquatus, Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Placcus, but being not Legitimately made, they resigned up their office. Written doe to this year assigne the Original of a new Customs, not unworthy to be mentioned. There had been no divorce from the beginning of the City to this time. Sp. Carvilius Ruge first of all dismissed his wife because she was barren, being by the Censours bound in Oath, to Marry a Wife for procreation of Children. The people were much displeased, not so much at the Novelty as cruelty of the things, for wives being joynd in a perpetual society of life, they thought it unjust and inhumane for any cause whatsoever to repudiate them. They likewise ever after hated Sp. Carvilius though he was of necessity compelled by the judgment of his friends to dismiss his wife who was much beloved by him, and very agreeable in her Manners. From this time there was more knots in the Law, and more suits in the Prators Courts, then being invented the Marriage Cautions, of which coming there was no need before Divorces were in use. This year likewise began a new custom concerning the Honours of their Generalls; C. Papirius perswading himselfe he had performed Actions worthy of a Triumph (having now at length firmly settled Corsica) and being denied that honour by the Senate, he did toward the End of his Consulship make a Triumph in Mount Alban on the third of the Nones of March. It pleased many to imitate this Example when they were denied a Triumph to make one in the Alban Mount, henceforward he was present at all sports in a mirtle Crown in memory of the Action, that he had overcome the Enemy in the Mirtle Fields. All things being at quiet in Sardinia and Corsica, the Ligustians still held out against whom were sent M. Aemilius L. F. Q. N. Barbula and M. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera, then Consuls. They, in their March understanding that the Gauls began to stirre, eased their Territories with the Army. For they being incited and provoked by the Flaminian Law, the Romans feared lest being Warlike, and angry men, they should raise any Commotions; it was therefore forbidden by the Magistrates to accommodate any Gaul with Gold or Silver; for the Boians, and other Gauls by selling of slaves and other Commodities had gathered a great bank of Money, and a suspicion was raised, that it was for a Roman War. Wherefore being more incensed, 'tis said that they understanding the Consuls were designed for Liguria, did in private meetings conclude, while the Roman Armies were far abroad, to March up to and assault the City it selfe. But, being terrified with the coming of the Consuls, and not prepared to make head against them, they entertained the Romans with all shew of Peace and friendship, and counterfeited Respects. The Consuls likewise being contented they had prevented the War, fained another cause of their coming thither; that through the Gallick Territories they might have a more commodious march to Liguria. The last year the Censours renounced the office; This year therefore Q. Fabius Q. F. Q. N. Maximus Verrucosus, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. Tudiscanus made the one and fourtieth Lustration, While these things are acting in Italy and at Rome, a new war was occasioned with the Illyrians upon their ground. The Illyrians exercising Pyracie, a cruell and greedy kind of theft, had taken many Italian Merchants coming out of the Haven of Brundisium and had slain some; at the first the Senate hearing this, among other complaints, did not much regard it. But the Pirates boldnesse encreasing by their impunity, and complaints more frequently and earnestly made unto them, they thought fit to send Embassadors, to demand satisfaction; as also to plead the Illyrian cause who had lately committed themselves to the faith of the Romans; for they inhabiting an Island in the Ionian sea, were daily prosecuted with all manner of injuries by the Illyrians, from whom they had revolted. C. & L. Cornucanius were sent on this Errand: While they were in their journey, Agron (the son of Plenratus) King of the Illyrians, called Ardayi, to whom their message was directed, departed this life leaving a son under age, by name Pinnus, and the Kingdom was governed by Teuta, Step-mother to the young Prince, with the advice of her friends: She being proud, and puffed up with Prosperity, having given Audience to the Roman Embassadors with some contempt, answered, That she would take care that the Romans should receive no publick injury from the Illyrians; but that it was not the custom of the Illyrian Kings, to prohibit private persons from making what gain they could by sea. Cornucanius the younger could not refrain his anger at this arrogant speech, but using an unseasonable liberty, though not unjust, replied, That 'tis a custom with the Romans, Teuta, to prosecute private wrongs with publick lick vengeance, and relieve the injur'd party; and we will endeavour, by the assistance of the gods, to compel you gladly and quickly to mend and reform your Kingly Customs. The woman was above measure offended at these words, but, for the present, dissembling her mind, when the Embassadors were departed, sent some Pirates after them, who slew Coruncanius the younger with part of his Retinue, burnt the Governours of ships with fire, and clap the rest in chains. Coltemporus also the Ambassador of the Illyrians was slain by the same Pirates.

The Romans understanding these things, did erect statues of three foot long in honour of Coruncanius the younger, and P. Junius, and decreed war against Tenta and the Illyrians. Tenta ignorant in government, having not learnt either by Reason or Custome to correct the Vices of her Feminine wit, behaved her self as timorous in bearing the anger of others, as she had been headlong in provoking it. Having therefore intelligence that a war was preparing against her, she promised, To restore those who were living, as for the dead, whom the Pirates had slain without her command, it lay not in her power to restore them. This Embassie (though it offered little satisfaction for so great injuries, yet because the Romans hoped to compose the Illyrian broils without a war) was entertained, only they required, That those who slew the Embassadors should be delivered up to them.

The woman seeing the war, she so much fear'd, to be deserr'd, out of the lightness of her mind returned from fear to her former insolence, denying to deliver up any one, and that she might confirm her words with as much fierceness in action, sendeth forces presently to besiege Issa. Whereupon the Romans thought fit to make no more delay, but sent both the Consuls thither with land and sea forces; the Consuls were L. Posthumius A.F.A.N. Albinus, and Cn. Fulvius Cn.F. Cn.N. Centumalus. Cn. Fulvius had the command of the Navy consisting of two hundred ships; L. Posthumius was General of the Legions. Then again Tenta, being terrified, sent Demetrius Pharins to the Consuls to crave Peace. And they agreed upon a Truce, In case the Illyrians would quit Coreyra which they had lately possessed. The Romans being gone to take in Coreyra, Tenta, as if all fear were now far from her doors, returned to her former counsels, and sent Deputies to besiege Dyrrachium and Apollonia. Others report, That Coreyra was not surrendered with the consent of Teuta, but by the private design of Demetrius, who, knowing that he was secretly accused of some crimes before Teuta, thought by betraying that place he was Governour of, to find a sure refuge and protection amongst the Romans against her fury.

The Illyrian Garrison was no sooner surrendered, but the Corcyrians by publick consent submitted themselves to the Romans, seeing no other means left for their safety, but to be protected against the injury of the Illyrians by the power of so illustrious a City. From Coreyra the Consul sailed to Apollonia, where he met L. Posthumius having waisted over his Army from Brundisium, which consisted of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse. The Apollonians greedily entertained the Romans, and committed themselves to their Faith. This being relieved they went to Dyrrachium, which presently became the Romans: The Illyrians who had began the siege thereof, running away for fear upon the first intelligence of the Consul's coming. With the same hast also the Ardyzi were forced into subjection, and Embassadors came from divers Nations of the farthest Illyrium with promise, To obey their commands if they might be admitted into Friendship; in which number were the Parthini and Asintanes. Demetrius Pharins was a great help and furtherance in these Achievements, for being carried up and down with the Consuls, he extolled the Strength and Integrity of the Romans, accused the Rashness and Inconstancy of Tenta; and some by reason and counsel, others by his authority he perswaded into a society and confederacy with the Romans. After this they steered their course to Issa, and in their passage landing at many places, they took most Towns without any great difficulty. Nutrins was stoutly defended by the Illyrians, and cost much blood before it was taken, some Collonels also and a Questor being slain there. The Romans grief for this was the lesser because they surpris'd twenty Vessels coming from Peloponnesus with money and great spoil. When they were come to Issa it happened as it had done at Dyrrachium, the siege was presently raised upon the approach of the Roman Navy: The Barbarians flying this way and that way into several places, except only the Pharians, who for Demetrius sake with the safety both of body and goods, were received into protection, forasmuch as he was born in the same Iland, and had the Government of it under King Agron. The news of these did diversly affect the instable mind of Tenta, sometimes dejected with fear, sometimes again very confident, as she considered the occasion. For as she was possessed with fear when she remembered so many Towns taken and demolished, that the sea coasts were plunder'd and waisted, that the Illyrians every where turned back and fled: On the other side she was encouraged at the stoutness of the Nutrins, and her hopes increased, considering Winter drew nigh, and that the Romans for fear of storms would suddenly depart; wherefore with a small Retinue she retired to Rhizon situate upon a River of the same name, expecting what remedy time would afford.

Her vain opinion was confirmed by the actions of the Consuls, who having committed to the Government of Demetrius the greater part of the Country they had taken, retired to Dyrrachium with the Navy and Army. But when she saw that L. Posthumius stayed behind with forty ships, and leaved an Army out of the Neighbour Cities to protect the Ardyzans and and other Illyrians who had revolted to the Romans, then Tenta began utterly to despair and thought of buying her peace upon any conditions whatsoever. At the beginning of the spring therefore she sent Embassadors to Rome, excusing what was past as being done by the Command of Agron whose Acts it was necessary for her to maintain. The Romans granted peace, not to her, who had no proper power of administering affairs, neither had deserved any favour at their hands, but to Pinneus the son of Agron, on these conditions, That he should duly pay what tribute was imposed on him, that he should quit all Illyrium, some few places excepted, that he should not sail beyond Lissus with above two Boats, and those unarmed. By this peace Corcyra, Pharus, Issa, Dyrachium and the Asintanes became wholly the Romans; what else was under Agron his jurisdiction being left to Pinneus. Tenta either for shame or by the command of the Romans left off the Government of the Realm, which Demetrius undertook under the name of Protector.

Thus being ended the Illyrian Quarrel, and the Limits of the Roman Empire extended even to Greece, the Commonwealth on the other hand was perplexed, for the Gauls were ready to rise up in Arms, and the Carthaginians power did mightily increase in Spain, which could not be established without great danger to the Romans. Hasdrubal the Son-in-law and successor of Hannibal, having revenged the death of his Father-in-law, did, partly by Arms, but more frequently by his Wisdom and Eloquence, wherein he excelled, reduce many Nations to the Carthaginian subjection; and built another Carthage called the New, in a gulf of the sea by a most commodious Haven. But the Gallick affairs being of nearer concernment, hindered for the present their designs against the Carthaginians: They endeavoured therefore to stop the proceedings of the Gauls by leagues and Covenants; They sent likewise Embassadors to Carthage and to Hasdrubal, warning them, To contain themselves beyond the River Iberus, and permit the Saguntines to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own Laws. Those things happened in the year when Sp. Carvilius Sp. F. Cn. N. Maximus and Q. Fabius Q. N. Maximus Verrucosus were again Consuls. About the sametime E. Posthumius Proconsul, who wintered in Illyrium, sent Embassadors from Corcyra to the Aetolians and Achaians, declaring what he had done, For what causes the war was undertaken, with what success managed, and upon what conditions finished. They were kindly entertained forasmuch as those Nations and all other the Grecians did vehemently hate the Illyrians by reason of the continual Pyracies exercised by them under Agron and Tenta.

The Senate hearing this, did allow of what the Proconsul had done, and moreover decreed another Embassie in the name of the Commonwealth, to the Corinthians and Athenians, declaring, The people of Rome good affection towards them, and their equity towards all men. Hereby the Romans purchased great good will amongst those people, and the Corinthians forthwith decreed this honour to the people of Rome, That they should be Partners in the Isthmian Games, which was one of the four greatest Solemnities in Greece. They were chiefly moved hereunto because the Romans had set at liberty, as Apollonia and other Grecian Cities, so Corcyra likewise, which was a Colonie of the Corinthians; the Athenians also embraced the Roman Society, and decreed, They should have the liberty of the City of Athens, and of the Eleusian Mysteries. In the mean time Cn. Fulvius Proconsul made a Naval Triumph over the Illyrians on the Calends of Quintilis, and beheaded the Illyrian Nobles whom he led in Triumph. This was the first Triumph over the Illyrians.

The next year P. Valerius L. F. M. N. Flaccus, and M. Atilius M. F. M. N. Regulus being Consuls, the number of Pretors was doubled, and they thought fit to create four that they might send some with command into Sicily and Sardinia. Amongst these M. Valerius was Pretor of Sardinia and Corsica, C. Flaminius of Sicily. At this time there was very great fear of a Gallick war, for 'twas reported that the Boians and Insubrians consulted not only one with the other, but with the Transalpine people, and had hired a great strength of Mercenaries of the Gatata a people of Gallia. They used therefore not only ordinary remedies against this evil, but such as a severe Judge would by no means excuse, but that the love of one Country makes some things pardonable which in themselves are horrid. For when (besides other prodigies they were terrified with) they found in the Sybill's books, That the Gauls and Grecians should one day possess the City of Rome; That they might by craft avert the threats of the Prediction, by the advice of the Priests, they buried alive two Gauls, of each sex one, and likewise two Grecians a man and a woman, in the Beef-market, that so they possessing part of the City, might seem to have fulfilled the Prophecy. This was done when M. Valerius M. F. M. N. Messalla and L. Apustius L. F. C. N. Fullo were Consuls. This year, amongst other no considerable occurrences, was most of it spent in making preparation for the Gallick War. There was raised a most incredible number both of horse and foot, toward this war all Italy in general joining with the Romans. Q. Fabius the Historian, who was present at the transaction of these affairs, reports, There were in arms eight hundred thousand men. That the number of the Romans and Campanians amounted to the number of two hundred forty eight thousand and two hundred footmen, and six and twenty thousand and six hundred horsemen. All the other multitude were Italians. The Ventii also and Cenomani afforded the Romans the help of twenty thousand men, who by frequent alarms and incursions might compel the neighbouring Boians to tarry to the defence of their own Country, and not join themselves with the other forces of the the Enemy, because they refused to hearken to Terms of Peace which the Romans propounded. For the Veneti and Cenamani being perswaded to renew friendship with Rome, the Insubrians, Arab. h. 5 and Boians persisted in Hostility: nevertheless their strength was not great, their Kings not daring to lead out all their armed men: but being forced to leave some at home to defend their Countreyes, with the rest (to wit, fifty thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse) they began their march through Etruria towards Rome.

In the mean time L. Amilius, Q. F. C. N. Papius, & C. Atilius M. F. M. N. had Sardinia and Ariminum, with the adjoining Gaules for their Provinces. For the Sardinians being aggrieved at the perpetuall presence of a Prætor, with his Virges and signet of Authority, did again move Tumults: but C. Atilius the Consull soon quieted them without any great difficulty. L. Amilius had more to do with the Gaules, having broken through Etruria, and marching to Rome. The Prætor of Etruria being not able to hinder their passage, overtook them at Clusium, and late in the Evening planted his Camp not farre from them. The Gaules invented a stratagem whereby to entice the Romans out to battell. In the dead of the night they marched with all their Foot to Fasula, leaving the Horse behind with instruction at break of day only to shew themselves to the Enemy, and presently betake themselves to the Foot Army, where should be reception for them in a convenient Camp, from whence likewise they would on the sudden charge the Romans unawares.

The Romans were hereby deceived, and pursued the horse as if they had fled, and about Fasula were received by the Enemy, fresh and ready prepared, being themselves weary and void of Counsell, as in an occurrence not foreseen by them. Their only course was either by fight to defend themselves, or to sell their bloods at a dear rate: But the Gaules exceeding in number, besides other advantages, slew of the Romans six thousand upon the place, and put the rest to flight. The Gaules endeavouring to take a fenced place upon an hill, (whither the greatest part of them which fled had betaken themselves) finding their strength to faile with their last nights march, the dayes fight retired to cure and refresh their bodies, leaving a party of horse to besiege the hillock, not doubting to reduce it into their power the next day, either by force or composition. In this very nick of time came L. Amilius, rather to be wished for, then upon any reasonable ground expected. For upon the first newes of the Gaules setting forward, he was sent to Ariminum, to defend the Coasts upon the Adriatick shore, but hearing their intention was to march to Rome, he marched by very great journeys from Ariminum, and by good luck came to this very place, and pitched his Camp not farre distant from the Enemy. The besieged seeing fires in the night time from that part, judging, as was true, that the Roman Army was come, sent out some of their men unarm'd, that they might the easier pass the Enemies Guards. The Consull by them understanding the state of Affaires, without any long deliberation, which the time would not permit, at break of day set forward with his horse to the hillock, giving order to the Tribunes to follow him with the Legions. The Gaules likewise were informed by the same fires, that the Romans were come, and entred into counsell concerning the present affaires. King Anousius advised, that they should not encounter the Enemy, nor their soldiers were laden with rich spoiles, but to return home, and lay aside their plunder, and then, if occasion were given of fighting, to return empty and nimble. Every one approving the counsell, they departed before night, taking their journey through Etruria, by the sea side. L. Amilius having taken in those who fled to the hill, and having intelligence of the Enemies march, would not fight him in a set battell, but resolved to follow them, laying hold of what opportunity time should afford.

In this conjuncture of Affaires fortune once more dispenced an unexpected accident. The other Consull C. Atilius arriving at Pisa from Sardinia, and there landing his Army, marched toward Rome along the very same Etrurian shore where the Gaules were returning. Neer Talamone a Port of Etruria, the Scouts of each Army first met one the other, and the Consull, by some Prisoners who were brought to him, understanding of the Gaules march, and his Colleague following them, wondered at so unusual a chance, and being confident of Victory, having the Enemy cooped up between two Consular Armies, gave order to the Colonells, To array the Army as well as the ground would permit, and lead their Regiments in a square body, and a slow marche. Himselfe, observing a piece of high ground, opportunely overlooking the way the Gaules most of necessity pass, set forward with a Party of horse to prepossess it. For he made what hal he could to fight the Enemy, being assured, if he were any thing worsted, to be relieved by his Colleague, if his undertaking succeeded, to carry away the chiefe Glory of the Victory. The Gaules seeing a troop of Enemies in the higher grounds, conjecturing it was a party of horse, sent round about in the night time by Amilius, sent out likewise some of their own horse, with the assistance of some light armed men, to open the passage. But being informed that the other Consull was come, he was forced to array and marshall his foot, with their spears each way toward the Enemy, having in the middle their backs joyned one to the other: For they saw C. Atilius before them, and well knew that L. Amilius followed them behind. Against L. Amilius they placed the Transalpine Mercenaries, in the front (who from their weapons are denominated Gastæ) behind these for a reserve were the Insubrians. Against Atilius were opposed the Pœnicians and Boians. The Waggon and Carts were placed as a rampire about each Wing: all their plunder, with a sufficient guard, was laid aside upon a neighbouring hill.

hill. The fight was now begun at that hill which C. Atilius had possessed, whereby L. Amilius conjectured that his Colleague was there, of whose journey he knew nothing certain, only he heard that he was arrived at Pisa. Taking Counsel therefore on a sudden he commandeth some of his own horse to ride to the place of fight. There the horse on both sides had a very hot encounter wherein C. Atilius the Consul was slain; and his head carried to the Gallick Kings. At length the Romans fighting with all might and main, kept the place, and repulsed the enemy. The Horse-fight being thus managed, the Foot charged each the other. There was to be seen a very terrible encounter, as for the number & strength of both parties, so for the strange ordering of the Battel; for the Gauls being included between two Roman Armies turned their faces on each side to battel; it being very doubtful whether this posture were a greater advantage to them; in that (having to deal with two enemies) they kept their Rear secure, and were of necessity compelled to stand to it having no way to flee; or that it were a greater disadvantage to be hemmed in by two Consular Armies. But the Romans were partly terrified with the very aspect of the men who stood in the front with stern countenances and vast bodies; partly encouraged not only with the sweetness of praise, but of plunder also, for among the former ranks of the Gauls there was not a man, but glistered with golden bracelets and arme strings. The fight being begun, the light armed men made a great slaughter of the Enemy, especially where the Gasatae stood, who in a barbarous ostentation had flung away their garments and fought naked in the front. For the gallick shields being long and narrow not able to cover the whole body, they stood like so many marks exposed to the Roman darts: and they fell without revenge, being not able to strike the enemy, not to come to pel-mel with light armed men. Wherefore growing desperate some running rashly upon the enemy were killed with darts before they could come to handy-strokes; others by degrees retiring backward disordered their own Battel. The Gasatae being thus vanquished by the light-armed men, the compleat armed did on every side charge the Boians, Insubrians, and Tauriscans and slew a great number, nevertheless the enemy stood with resolute minds, being in nothing inferior but in their weapons; for neither did their shields defend their bodies, neither did their swords much offend the Romans, for being made only to hacke and hew they had no good paynts; they were likewise made crooked at the first blow, and unfit for a second, unless they be straightened againe by your foot on the ground. The Romans having already the better, were assured of the victory by the returne of the horse, who, having put the Gallick horse to flight, riding down the hill made an impression upon the flank of the enemy; so much the more irresistible as coming from the higher ground. After this manner Polybius describeth the Battel of the Gauls in Etruria; from whence others with little reason do dissent. For who can easily believe, that the Gauls were compelled by a tempest to fly in the night time fearing the anger of the Gods? And that C. Atilius seeing upon their Rear was slain? That afterward, each party for some dayes kept within their defences, L. Amilius fought happily with them? neither are they any more to be credited, who relate the Battel as fought, not on the sea Coasts, but, in the Aretine Territories. There is no question made but that forty thousand Gauls were then slain, little lesse then ten thousand taken, with Concelitanus one of their Kings: the other King Anerostus who was of greater reputation for power and courage, escaping with a small company, in his flight cut the throats of all his Kindred and his own also. There was great plunder found, which the Consul caused to be restored to those from whom it was at first taken, every master owning his own goods. Then marching with his own Army and that of Atilius, through Liguria into the Boians Country he gave it in plunder to his souldiers as a reward of their pains taken, and they in a few dayes being sufficiently laden with spoils, he returned to Rome, to the greater joy of all, because the war was formidable. Scarce any mans Triumph was ever so much celebrated with acclamations of the people; being otherwise of it self very gallant and memorable as for the glory of his noble performances, so for the number of the Captives and the worth of the spoils. There were many military Ensignes, and abundance of gold Chains and Bracelets, the ornaments of valiant men amongst the Gauls. But all mens eyes were cheifly intended upon Britomarus and the other Gallick Princes, whom Amilius by way of scoff led girt and armed into the Capitol, as if thereby he tooke care they should fulfil the vow they had made, Never to loose their Girdles or Belts, till they had ascended the Capitol. L. Amilius made this Triumph over the Gauls on the third of the Nones of march. This year was made the one and fortieth Lustration by the Censors, Q. Claudius Ap. F. C. N. Censor and M. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera. The fear of the Gallick war was over, but the desire of revenge remained, and both the next years Consuls had Gallia for their Province; the Consuls were T. Manlius T. F. T. N. Torquatus and Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flaccus again. The people cheerfully decreed them Armies and whatsoever accommodation belongeth to the Commencing or prosecuting a War. For it was hoped, that after so great a victory, they might easily drive away the Gauls from about the Po if they minded their business. The Consuls being gone with their Armies presently terrified the Boians into submission; their expedition afterwards was not so quick by reason of the Pestilence and so many showrs which fell. Others affirm, That these Consuls crossed the Po, and in a few battel overcame the Insubrians that they slew three and twenty thousand and took five thousand. But I rather follow the authority of Polybius in these affairs.

In the mean time because the Consuls being in a far Country, and were hindered either by action, or by showres, so that they could not return to the general Assembly: L. Cælius L. F. F. 1st Capit.
C. N. Metellus was Created for Dictatour, who consecrated for Master of the Horse M. Fabius M. F. N. Butro, by the Assembly, and Flaminius C. F. N. and P. Furius Sp. F. M. N.
Philus were made Consuls. These as I think were the first Romans, who making an invasion into the Insubrians Countrey, crossed the Po with their Army, where the River Padusa falleth into the Po.

This boldness cost them much labour and some blood; for in their passes over the River, and while they pitched their Campes, the enemy fiercely falling in upon them slew a considerable number. The Romans trouble and care upon this News, was mightily increased by many Prodigious related, as that in the Picene Territories, a River ran blood, that in Etruria the sky was seen to burn, that at Ariminum in the night time light appeared, and three Moones were seen at the same time; also a Vultur was said to sit many dayes together in the Forum at Rome. For though about the same time Caria was shaken with an Earthquake, and the Rhodian Colossus fell down, these things were not thought to concern the Romans at all. Concerning the other Prodigious, the Augurs being asked their advice, answered, that the Consuls were not rightly chosen, whereupon letters were sent after them to recal them back to the City. In the mean time the Consuls having made a Truce, had quitted the Insubrians Countrey, and afterward having raised Auxiliaries in the Countrey of the Cenomanni, had again begun to infest the grounds lying under the Alps, whereupon the Insubrians enraged with anger, carried into the field the golden ensignes (out of the Temple of Minerva) which were called Immoveable, because it was not lawful to stir them but in the time of Extreem Necessity; and had now met the Romans with an Army of fifty thousand men, ready to enter battel. At this very time came the letters from the Senate. C. Flaminius either guessing at the substance of the letters, or being pre-informed by his friends, perswaded his Colleague, not to open them before battel.

Being resolved to fight, they consulted about their Mercenary Gaules, lest if they were neglected, they might have cause to quarrel; and if admitted to the fight, they might have occasion of doing harm. For they feared their inconstancy, especially fighting against Neighbours and Kinsmen. At last they thought fit to place them on the other side of the River, where the bridges being beaten down, they neither could do any harm to the Romans, nor have opportunity to flee, but to trust in their courage. After a sharp dispute the Romans obtained the Victory, to the greater praise of the Tribunes then the Consuls. For C. Flaminius had ordered the Battel so near the brink of the River, that there was no space left to receive the Troopes in case they had been forced to Retire; which without doubt would have proved the ruine of the whole Army. But the Tribunes having had experience by former battels, that all the Gallick Valour consisteth in the first charge, which is very hot, but short, and if the brunt of it be once borne, there is no more to be feared from them; did divide the spears of the Triarii among the first ranks, that with them they might receive the first onset, and afterward flinging them away, draw their Swords when the fight began; the Gallick Swords were presently blunted, and made crooked at the first stroke upon the spears; and while they were busie in making them straight, the Romans advancing with their drawing Rapiers, took from them the use of their Weapons: For this inconvenience is in the Gallick Swords, that being made only to hack, some time is required in lifting up the hand, and preparing for the strokes, which if it be denied, they are of no use. But the Romans thrusting with the point could do their business in a moment, and so pressing forward to the bodies of the enemies, they did securely thrust them into the face and breasts.

It is reported that nine thousand Gaules were slain, and double the number taken. After the Victory they spoiled the grounds round about, and gathered much Plunder. Then at length they thought fit to read the Senates letters, the contents whereof Philus was ready to obey: But C. Flaminius insisted, that this was the envy of some Senators, and not the fault of the Auspices, whereof there could be no more certain argument, then the Victory they had obtained; he said also he would not return till either the War was finished, or his Magistracy expired: adding moreover, that he would cause the Romans to leave off the foolish observation of Auguries, and such other superstitious. Nevertheless P. Furius persisting in his resolution, the Army of Flaminius, fearing that after his departure they should not be very safe in the enemies Countrey, perswaded him to tarry for some few dayes; but he did utterly abstain from all actions; Flaminius taking in the mean time some Castles, as also a City of no small renown among those people. The spoiles he gave to his souldiers, to prepare their minds for his defence in that quarrel he knew would arise between him and the Senate. This City indeed was so moved with indignation, that none went out according to the custome to meet the Consuls, and not only Flaminius but for his sake Philus also was denied the honour of Triumph. At length Flaminius by the peoples favour entred the City triumphing on the fourth of the Ides of March. Many rich spoiles were to be seen in that Triumph: Great store of Armes, and chains of Gold, out of which Flaminius dedicated a Token of Victory to Jupiter in the Capitolum, inverting the Gallicks Vow, who had promised one of the Romans spoiles to dedicate a Chain to Mars. Afterward the other Consul triumphed over the Gaules, and the Ligurians on the fourth of the Ides of March. The Senates ill will being hereby rather intended then overcome, did not cease till they were both forced to disdain this their second Triumph: about the same time, by the like severity, two very eminent persons were deprived of their Priesthood, M. Cornelius Cethegus, because he had not a right laid open the Entrails, and Q. Sulpicius, because in the time of sacrifice his cap fell from his head. When these Consuls time was out, the Assembly was held by an Interrex, where M. Claudius M. F. M. N. Marcellus being made Consul, assumed for his Colleague C. Cornelius L. F. L. N. Scipio Calvus. These Consuls denied Peace to the Insubrians though they petitioned for it, M. Marcellus chiefly refusing all Conditions, out of his desire to Triumph. And the Gauls themselves seemed to meditate war rather than Peace, for having a new hired thirty thousand Gasata, and overcome the Alpes, they had gathered together a far greater number of Insubrians.

The war being thus begun, the Consuls set out in the beginning of the spring, and besieged Acerra, a Town between Ps and the Alpes. It seeming difficult to drive the Romans from the siege, Britomarus with ten thousand Gasata, resolved to go forth, and waste the Regions about Ps, which the Consuls understanding, so divided their Forces, that Cn. Cornelius might with part of the Army prosecute the siege, while Marcellus with two thirds of the Horse, and a choice company of light armed men, went about to succour and defend their Associates. Having chosen the lightest and nimblest, not above six hundred, with these and his Horse he marched day and night toward the Enemy, whom having overtaken at Clasidium, he presently encountered before he could refresh his men, not of his own good will, but forced by the fury of the Gasata, who being superiour in number, and arrogating to themselves the mastery in horsemanship, hearing the Consul had brought but few foot along with him, left off their siege of Clasidium, and forthwith spurr'd on to crush him. Marcellus, having drawn out his battell at length, that he might not be encompassed by the multitude of his Enemies, marched forward to meet them. Their bodies were now not far asunder, when the Consul intending to begin the Charge, his Horse affrighted with the clamour and shouts of the Gauls, started aside and carried him back. The Consul fearing least this accident being esteemed an ill Omen, should daunt the courage of his men, as his horse wheeled about he addrest the Sun, as if he had turned about his Horse for the same purpose, according to the ancient custom, men using to turn themselves about when they worshipped the Gods. 'Tis reported, that before the first onset, he vowed to Jupiter Feretrius the fairest of the Enemies Armes. And presently espying Britomarus in the head of his Troopes, his armour glittering with Gold and Silver, and other colours, he judged these to be the Armes which he had vowed. The King also, having seen the Roman General, advanced far before his men, and by voice and gesture challenged him to Combat. M. Marcellus accepted, and immediately having run him through the breast-plate, wounded him with the spear, and with the force of his horse casting him to the ground, reiterating his strokes he slew him in the place, whereupon leaping off his horse and holding the armes in his hands, he lift up his eyes to heaven, saying, Jupiter Feretrius, who beholdest the deeds of Valiant Commanders in battell! Behold, I the third Roman, as thy self canst witness, a General having slain a General of the Enemies, doe consecrate the Royall spoils unto thee: Doe thou suffer our affaires prosperously to succeed even to the issue of the War. Marcellus taking horse again, they entred battell with all might and main, the Romans fighting most courageously; the Consul's boldness and good Fortune having filled them no less with Valour for the Encounter, then with hopes of Victory. Wherefore neither the Gallick horse nor yet the Foot which came to their reliefe could endure the brunt; so that a few men, which is rarely seen, carried away the Victory from a numerous Army. The spoils being gathered up, the Consul returned to his Colleague, who having taken Acerra where he found great store of Corne, being now about Mediolanum, had much ado to defend himselfe from the Enemy, for while he was busie in the siege of their strongest and most populous City, the Metropolis of Insubria, they had as it were round besieged him with great multitudes. But Marcellus his approach quickly altered the Scene. For the Gasata being informed of their Kings death, went away, and Mediolanum being by them forsaken, was not able to defend it selfe. So that many of the Insubrian forces being slain, Mediolanum; and after that Comum taken, the other Cities together with the whole Nation submitted themselves to the Romans, being fined in a summe of money, and part of their grounds, having otherwise good Conditions of Peace. M. Marcellus being returned home, made a most illustrious triumph over the Insubrian Gauls, and the Germans on the Calends of March. This is the first mention of the Germans in the Roman History, who being hired, came from the Nations beyond the Rhene, under the conduct of Virdomarus their General. These and the Gallick Captives, men of vast stature of body, with other rich spoiles were led before the Triumphant Chariot. The Consul followed, with the rarest spectacle, carrying the armes of the slain General to Jupiter Feretrius; after him marched his souldiers harnessed with glittering Armes, making shouts, and Military Acclamations. In this order being come to the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, M. Marcellus descending from his Chariot, dedicated his Royall spoils to Jupiter, being the third after Romulus and A. Cornelius Cossus, who had done so; and after him no man ever did the like. The people of Rome beheld these Armes with the greater pleasure, in that the Enemies were said to have vowed the Roman Armes to Vulcan. So great was the Joy of this Victory, that the Romans out of the spoiles, sent a Golden Cup to Apollo of Delphos; and of the Gallick Armes to their Associate Cities round about Demetrius observing what was done, took a good Counsel as in such a dangerous case could be, for declining the present skirmish, and calling his souldiers together, Pulian men, he, it appears that Demetrius was not so much to be trusted for, because themselves to tragedies, they declare little trust in their force of arms. They have made use of the night season to creep into this Island, of which, if I be not deceived in you, they shall possess no more, then what they can cover with their bodies having payed for it with their lives. Only you, my Country-men of Pharac, and young men of Illyria, be mindful of your Country, of your honour, and make the Romans know, 'twas neither their valour nor our cowardize, which gave them occasion once to Triumph at Rome over the Illyrians. It was not Fulvius or Poss, Illyria with all their Comets and strength, but Tarsa which conquered Illyria by her rashness and impotence of affection. And, to omit other things, ye are not ignorant, that at that time their victory had not been so easie, but that Tarsa chose to have me rather her enemy then her Protector. But because I firmly trust to you, and the time requires rather deeds then words, I shall say no more. Ye have courage, ye have weapons, ye see the necessity, which is able to make a coward fight, danger is imminent both to your selves, and your Citie unless by your valour ye repel it. Let us on then and with happy fortune charge these men who are newly crept out of their hiding places. We shall do well enough with those who are landing, if we once overcome these, the others will flee to their ships in greater haste than they have them.

Having thus for the time encouraged his men, he leads them on to charge those who were possessed of the Hill, and they as diligently ordering themselves sustained his charge, till they, who in the meane time had landed, coming upon his Rears utterly routed his whole body with great slaughter. Some few by flight escaped to the Town, others by blind paths slipped away. Demetrius who in certaine by-places had boates ready prepared for all adventures, getting aboard one of them fled to Phillip King of Macedon, by whom being entertained, he did by flattery, and Tyrannical advice corrupt the young man's manners, which before were laudable, and likewise was author unto him of the Roman War and many other Calamities. After this fight Pharac was taken, and by the Consul's Command plunder'd and demolished. The Illyrian affaires being afterward settled to his own liking the Consul now at the end of Summer returned to Rome to obtaine his Triumph. In the narration of this War I have likewise chosen to follow Pollux, being not ignorant that others attribute the glory of finishing this War to both the Consuls, who having summoned Demetrius to appeare before them, did, upon default, War with him in the Island of Issa by the same acts as I have related, and then taking Pharac by Treachery expelled him out of the Dominions. Concerning whose end likewise they differ from Polybius, who lived neerer these times and these places, but those that lived after this time I shall pass by. King Philip who years declared him innocent of these designs, did spare the Illyrians, and renewed the league with him, with addition of some Articles. L. Aemilius made most glorious Triumph over these people, and I find also that M. Livius Triumphed for this War, but most wisely mention it not, 'tis likely because the performances of L. Paulus, being the more eminent, did obscure the glory of his Colleague.

More notable a while after was the Judgment and condemnation of the same M. Livius. He and L. Paulus being out of Envy accused, That they had not equally distributed the spoils among the souldiers, but had converted many things to other uses, did undergoe the sentence of the people. L. Paulus hardly escaped, M. Livius was condemned by all the Tribes except only the Mecian, which despite and indignity he took so heavily, that departing the Citie, he avoided all meetings, till the Commonwealth's occasion recalled him to his former course of life. But these things hapned in the Consulship of P. Cornelius Scipio and Tib. Sempronius Longon. But in the same year when M. Livius and Paulus were Consuls, one Archagathus the son of Lysanias came out of Troas to Rome, who professing Physick was made free of the Citie, endowed with all the privileges of a Roman, and had a shop bought for him at the Publick charge in the Acilian street, adding not so much worthy taking notice of, but that then first was the name of the Medicinal faculty heard of and known at Rome, they having to this time preserved their health by temperance and remedies not bought. In the same Consulship Cochin were deduced to Placida and Cremona in the Gallie Territories. Being none of the least causes of anger which moved the Boians and Insubrians to incline to Hannibal, who, now assailing Suguntum which all might did by the ruin thereof prepare his way to the Roman Wars. But these and other commotions, which in great numbers, and with no lesse Terror and violence presently assailed the Romans, will the better be understood by relating foregoing Circumstances.
